Dick's new tooth will get a good start with Ipana—best decay-bacteria destroyer of all leading tooth pastes

THIS SPACE RESERVED

for a tooth that must last for 63 years

YOU: I always make very sure my boy brushes his teeth.

US: That's good. It's even better if he uses Ipana with WD-9!

YOU: What's so wonderful about WD-9?

US: WD-9 is a powerful decay fighter. Ipana with WD-9 destroys decay bacteria best of all leading brands, including fluoride tooth pastes.

YOU: That's fine . . . but if my boy doesn't like the taste of a tooth paste, he simply won't use it.

US: Ipana's new minty flavor is a hit with just about *every*body! And Ipana does as good a job on your teeth as on children's. Try a tube soon?

- New king-size cap is easy-to-use, hard-to-lose.
- Tube can stand upright.

New-formula Ipana® with WD-9 destroys decay bacteria best of all leading brands

"I've got four boys," writes Mrs. Will Hayes, "and that means lots of clothes to keep clean and white.

"When I heard that blue Cheer washes clothes whiter I decided to try it on a really dirty shirt.

"After all, if things are really white then I know my whole wash is clean. So, into my automatic went Cheer.

"Well, after ironing, my son Laird put on his nice clean shirt. Then I made that window test of yours and . . .

Mrs. Will Hayes of Santa Barbara, Calif. making the Cheer window test.

"Now I'm convinced! Cheer washes so white I could see the difference!"

Cheer's Blue-Magic whitener makes the difference . . . and only blue Cheer has it!

From all over the country women like Mrs. Hayes are writing us to say that blue Cheer does wash whiter.

One wash with Cheer and you'll see the difference, too. A difference so great that your things look (and actually are) whiter than the day you bought them.

Here's why a Cheer wash is so different. Only Cheer has the Blue-Magic whitener—a special ingredient that gets clothes truly white.

Try blue Cheer and make your own window test. You've never seen any white like Cheer-white.

Recommended for Automatics

Of course! Agitator automatics are designed to work best with active suds like Cheer's. That's why leading makers of automatic washers specifically recommend blue Cheer.

If you judge your wash by whiteness—it's got to be Cheer!

Stanley Ellin

STANLEY ELLIN, known as a mystery-story writer, has turned his hand to something different in The Romantic (page 36). "This," he says, "reflects my nonsinister side." There's a hint of the other side in his next remark, though: "I was born in New York City, live in New York and expect to die with my boots on somewhere in the middle of a traffic pile-up—in New York, of course." So far, he is in fine fettle, has a long list of books, movie scripts and stories behind him (in 1954 he won the Edgar Allan Poe Award for distinction in the field of the mystery short story) and goodness knows how many ahead. What's more, a beautiful wife and 16-year-old daughter welcome him at home after he has negotiated that traffic.

Patricia Finney

The writer of this month's featured story (The Archbishop's Dilemma, page 34) was born in Ireland, brought up in Scotland and traveled widely before coming to this country with her American husband. "I lived in Edinburgh," says PATRICIA HAZLETT FINNEY casually, "also in Manchester, Glasgow, Prague, Budapest, London, Paris, Vienna, but have been in Tucson since 1939." (Atlas, anyone?) Her favorite spots, though, are Mexico and Arizona, where her husband does newscasting and the children keep her busy. "I have no hobbies," she explains, "but I like to cook and I like to eat the things I cook and so do most of my friends. My favorite food is a toasted tortilla the size of a bicycle wheel, covered with melted butter and melted cheese, paper-thin and delectable, preferably eaten in a patio in the moonlight. Incidentally, I like people, all kinds, and consequently have great difficulty accomplishing anything." Accomplish she does, of course—but when and how remain her secret.

Walter Clemons

Apparently WALTER CLEMONS became a man with a mission early in life. Mission? Writing. (See The Merrymakers on page 50.) He grew up in Houston, went to Princeton—where he composed Triangle Show tunes, among other things, and graduated summa cum laude. In 1951 he moved on to Magdalen College, Oxford, as a Rhodes scholar. "Since then," he reports, "I've worked as an ordinary seaman and as a book reviewer for the Spectator in London." Note: he was an ordinary seaman on an ordinary boat doing seismograph work in the Gulf of Mexico. Seismograph work, in this case, meant searching for some geophysical structure which might produce oil and gas. Now, after a year in Paris (writing) and a summer on Majorca (writing some more) he's heading home—typewriter in hand, we hope.

Our READERS WRITE US

On Commercialization and Too Much Sex

Ridgefield Park, New Jersey

I recently graduated from high school, and your articles are the most accurate I have seen in recent periodicals. I think one of the greatest factors in juvenile delinquency is that teen-agers just don't know how to have fun.

Name Withheld

Reading, Massachusetts

Because I hold the JOURNAL in such high regard, I was particularly disappointed by the shallowness of the viewpoint (and there was only one) expressed in your forum. Of course Americans commercialize sex. What human emotion is not exploited for advertising purposes today? But what is so *un*desirable about sexual attractiveness?

As a minister's wife, I get to know a great many families—and it is my observation that those families are the happiest in which the wife and mother does not act like the stereotype of a dowdy old maid. Apparently it never occurred to your panelists that a girl can wear a "well-filled flaming red dress" and still possess all the qualities that make a good wife and mother. Certainly it is important that young people learn that the psychological, intellectual and spiritual aspects of love are as important as the physical aspects. But isn't it possible to recommend that more attention be given to the nonphysical side without being so emotionally wrought up over the fact that the physical side is widely recognized in our culture today? Let's not get so carried away with reforming zeal that we try to convince ourselves that we must never think about sex until we are safely married. This seems to be the basic assumption underlying all that was said by the forum—and I don't think it's very wise or realistic. Please, let's have more than one viewpoint in our forums.

MRS. BRANDOCH L. LOVELY

Eugene, Oregon

I believe that if parents can take the time to watch over their children, rear them according to the laws of good living, give them a strong faith and a good example, then whether or not sex is being commercialized will be unimportant. Let's worry a little more about slums, the lack of teachers for our children and, among other things, helping the handicapped, and these other things will assume their proper perspective. (I think if a deodorant ad, by asking if you are kissable tonight, can get people who badly need a deodorant to buy one, so much the better!)

CAROL ROMAINE

Lafayette, Indiana

I'd like to see advertisements use models who look healthy, sane and decent (whose legs, bosoms and lips are those of the average human being, so that her heart and mind might be indicated as functioning too). I'd like to see magazines print articles with healthy "snob appeal" on the meaning of being a real lady or gentleman—a real human being who is neither feverish nor loutish. Good heavens, where is our pride and native common sense?

A DISGUSTED MOTHER

Chico, California

I heartily agreed with all that was said in Are We Commercializing Sex? but I felt one point was neglected: that even very reputable magazines, including the JOURNAL, contribute to teen-age curiosity and interest in sex. Because of such articles as What Wives Don't Know About Sex, the average "nice" girl with high standards can't help wondering what really does happen in marriage. She asks, "What should I know about sex?" and feels excited and worried about it. She reads more articles to seek out the answers, but nobody comes right out and says what happens, and she is only confronted with more questions and more fear.

R.A.C., age 16

Salem, Oregon

We feel there are very few teen-aged girls like Kathy (I Wish My Parents Would be More Strict)—and if many parents read this article, they will get a distorted view of the rest of us. We are not what Kathy considered "chicken," but we don't go in for her type of parties either!

(Signed by 17 teen-aged girls)

An Army Base in Germany

Thank you for I Wish My Parents Would be More Strict, and What's a Mother to Do? I suppose you'll receive many indignant letters from prim readers who will be thoroughly shocked at the frankness of the articles. As a teen-ager, I am pleased that someone has presented so accurately the problems that face us today.

GAYLE ROCKEY

Sandy, Utah

You have been good to help your readers with their sex problems. Now I'd like to have your help with my problem. My problem is too much sex—too much sex in the JOURNAL.

Your articles on Wives and Husbands and Sex are informative and probably helpful to some people. But we feel that such specific and detailed information can only excite undue curiosity and disgust in the minds of young readers. Can't articles of this nature be offered in booklet form to be mailed on request?

MRS. RALPH BISHOP

Castleton, Virginia

Could you please print articles on sex so that the backs will be foods or fashions? I have five children and I am trying to tell them all they need to know at various ages. They are allowed to look through adult magazines (My rule is "It's not good, it's not bad, it's for adults!"), but you've given me a real problem. I won't hide the magazine or discontinue it—and I don't intend to have my nine- and ten-year-old daughters preparing for life on What Husbands Don't Know About Sex. If only I could snip them out more easily!

MRS. PHILIP B. MELODY

Chicago, Illinois

I found What Husbands Don't Know About Sex exceptionally good, and I would like to purchase reprints. It is very difficult to get patients to read textbooks (they appear so formidable). To have such an excellent article as that by Doctor Stone might well be an extremely good stimulus to encourage people to read further in exploring the subject and in an effort to make a better adjustment.

ROLAND R. CROSS, JR., M.D.

Lesson in Democracy, Junior Grade

New York City

Dear Editors: Something curious happened here last Election Day. My daughter, Megan, just turned five, spent most of the morning at the window of our apartment watching voters crowd into the church across the street. I explained to her that the church basement was a "polling place" and that the people were going in to vote to decide which man they wanted for governor of our state, and what others they wanted to help with the business of running the whole country. Since she had seen many candidates on television, she had an idea that this was some sort of popularity contest. But with a five-year-old's curiosity, Megan wanted to vote too. Round four o'clock, when the crowd had thinned, I took her across the street to show her how things worked.

A policeman inside the polling place asked if he could be of any help. He didn't look like a character from Dragnet, nor like a model for a recruiting poster. Just a good-natured, easy young man in a wrinkle-soft uniform. I explained that I had voted earlier, but my child was curious about Election Day; I had told her she was too young to vote, but we just wanted to look around.

"Why, she looks old enough to vote to me," the policeman said seriously. "Just wait till I get the voting machine, sister." He seated Megan on a table, then went to get the small sample voting board. Solemnly he asked her her name and address, wrote both on a slip of paper, then showed her which levers to pull for various candidates. She made her choices. "You watch television tomorrow," the policeman said. "Tonight we're going to add up the votes to see who won. And when you're twenty-one we're going to add your vote, too, like all the big girls'."

Megan looked very proud and shy and just nodded her head. He lifted her down from the table. No one laughed.

"I think kids learn fast," the policeman said to me then. "Maybe this will give her the idea that it's an easy thing to vote in this country."

What the policeman said is true, of course. Kids do learn fast. That I knew—but I had been wondering for some time how to teach some of the important things such as the meaning of the word "democracy." I realized, with gratitude, that I would not be her only teacher. To the composite picture of American life, the pattern of memories that would form the adult, that policeman had made a bright and clear contribution. Probably he forgot the little girl a few moments after he talked with her. Fortunately, I think she will remember him the rest of her life.

Sincerely,
MAUREEN DALY McGIVERN

Warmth of American Hearts

Seoul, Korea

Dear Miss Posson: As another winter approaches, we learn that its cold will be mitigated to some extent by the warmth of American women's hearts, transmitted through their busy fingers to Korea in the form of knitted socks, mittens, sweaters and caps.

The war orphans and others made destitute by conditions beyond their control appreciate the interest in their welfare taken by the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL and its readers, including the William Sneiders of Asbury Park, New Jersey, and I speak for them as well as myself.

Some progress is being made in alleviating suffering and in rebuilding Korea, but the road ahead is long and hard. The assistance of sympathetic Americans encourages us to look forward to the day when all Korea will be free and united and again self-supporting.

Sincerely,
FRANCESCA RHEE
(Mrs. Syngman Rhee)

From the Third Grade

Traverse City, Michigan

Dear Editor: Our teacher and we are very proud of this poem. We made it when it hailed and the wind blew strong.

First we listened to the window. We thought it might break. We went outside, listening, watching and feeling. Then we thought of real good words so we could almost picture the weather.

THE THRASHING WIND

The whirling wind dives and soars on his way to nowhere.
As he zooms by, he thrashes through the trees
And tangles the cracking branches.
He spits midget marbles that bounce on the windows,
Which rattle and roar like faded thunder.

Love,

These biscuits were made with another shortening and baked 15 minutes at 425 degrees oven heat. Compare their appearance with the biscuits on the right.

These biscuits were made with golden Fluffo from the same recipe and baked for the same length of time at the same heat as the biscuits on the left.

Something Golden Happens

(golden fluffiness you've never gotten with any other shortening)

Pure shortening, not a table spread.
Golden yellow from pure, wholesome carotene.

Expect surprising results when you use Fluffo; it's an altogether surprising shortening. To make it, we had to break down old-style shortening to its very molecules, and improve them; it takes the cream of the crop to make golden Fluffo.

No other leading shortening gives you such light, fluffy, golden-brown biscuits, golden yellow inside even before you butter them. No change in your recipe —just a wonderful change in results.

No other kind of shortening gives you such crisp, light, golden-brown fried foods. Everything fried right and light in Fluffo is beautifully browned all over—and just as digestible as it looks.

Fluffo even handles differently; it's so much lighter and fluffier it's a joy to use. Blends with fewer, easier strokes, and the golden color lets you see how perfectly you're mixing cake batter or pie dough. Try golden Fluffo; how can you possibly miss?

THE WORLD OF GRANDMA MOSES

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

PHILADELPHIA MUSEUM OF ART

THE MAP, dry point by Mary Cassatt (American School, 1845–1926). Size, 6⅛ x 8¾ inches.

There is a law in life and nature that works infallibly. It is that everything must be paid for. Every loss brings some gain; every gain entails a loss. For everything one desires, something that one also cherishes must be exchanged.

There is no such thing in human affairs as infinite progress, the illusion of the last century out of which has grown most of the "isms" and "ideologies" of the past hundred years. All of them are messianic in that they promise the evolution of man into a perfect state of bliss, denying the compensatory forces that forever operate.

The paintings of Grandma Moses and their extraordinary popularity seem to me to illustrate this. The painter herself is a phenomenon. Although she had never painted seriously until she was seventy-seven, and had no formal training whatever, the pictures of this farm woman, whose life since childhood has been one of hard toil, have captured the critics, enchanted the public, and made her at ninety-six, and from her own standards at least, a rich woman.

Being hailed by the critics as an "authentic American primitive" has boosted the prices of her pictures and attracted buyers who look at all purchases of art as an investment that will retain or increase in money value. But there is no money value in the reproductions that others buy and live with so pleasurably.

She is not a great artist, one whose hallmark is always intensity and originality of expression, rising above but grounded upon superb craftsmanship. She lacks the power to disturb, or elicit wonder, or evoke in the beholder a new and distinguished experience.

What, then, accounts for her fame? Is it not that she illustrates a world that has gone beyond hope of recovery, and that in retrospect wears the aura of a lost paradise?

Is the view wholly sentimental?

Grandma Moses depicts—and idealizes—scenes from the upstate New York farming community where she still lives as she recalls them from her childhood and youth. What distinguishes them is freedom, gaiety, and boundless and diverse activity, going on without the pressures of mechanical time.

But how was life actually conducted?

It was a life of "backbreaking" toil, almost totally without "laborsaving" devices. The horsepower of the farm was horses, mules or oxen that the farmer followed with his plow, harrow and reaper. Fuel was cut in the wood lot with an ax (not a powered chain saw) and split or sawed by hand in the woodshed. Homes were heated with chunk stoves, requiring stoking, and food was cooked and water heated on a wood-burning range. Laundry was washed on a scrub board with homemade soap made of leftover fats, soda and lye, and pressed with irons heated on the stove. Children attended ungraded schools irregularly, seldom went beyond "grammar" school and often left to work with their fathers after the fifth or sixth grade, though there were exceptions—youngsters who went on to "academies" and further, as the biographies of many great Americans attest, but even then "working their way through."

Families were large, but many children died early from diseases and epidemics not even diagnosed—or children lost one or another of their parents from "black" fever, "inflammation of the bowels" (probably appendicitis), "brain fever"—meningitis?—and from typhoid and diphtheria. But that was true not only on farms.

The farm was a hive of industry, in which everyone participated, including very small children.

There were always cattle and poultry to feed, vegetables to hoe, wood to split, lamps to be cleaned and filled, clothes to be cut, sewed, made over, patched and darned. Berries had to be picked, fruit gathered, butter churned, vegetables and fruit pickled, jellied, or canned in Mason jars, and meat salted, smoked, corned or also canned. Long shelves crowded with jars hung from the rafters of deep cellars along with bacon and hams. Barrels and great stone jars held salt pork, corned beef, pickled beets, cucumbers, apples. There were gunny sacks full of dried beans, carrots and other vegetables in boxes of sand, and always a huge bin of potatoes.

These cellars were really "stores," holding most of the edibles one can buy in stores today, as well as "preserves," pickles and relishes that one can rarely find at all. And all this autumn-to-autumn store was grown and processed by the family itself.

As a child and young girl whose father was a minister in upstate New York in villages surrounded by farms, I often visited the farm homes of his parishioners and once lived with one of them for several months. My recollection is of amazing abundance, of breakfasts that would be other people's dinners and dinners that would be others' banquets. Not one dessert, but pie and cake, cookies and doughnuts, following meat, potatoes or a huge platter of eggs and an array of vegetables, with pickles on the side. Homemade bread fresh every day, popovers, muffins, gems fresh from the oven, and all consumed with the Gargantuan appetites of those continually in fresh air and on the move. I was "allowed" to collect eggs, pick and shell peas, gather strawberries and raspberries, make beds and ride the farm horses, all of which seemed to me, working with other boys and girls, the most superior form of play I had ever known.

Sleeping rooms, then, were "chambers," their beds covered with "comforters," quilted in tiny stitches by hand, atop feather beds, their tickings stuffed with the more downy feathers of the farm's slaughtered poultry. And if the rooms were chilly, so much cozier the beds.

The kitchen invariably the largest, brightest room in the house, was the center of family

NEW! FOR DISHWASHER OWNERS

Cascade eliminates drops that spot!

Only Cascade has an exclusive ingredient that changes drops of water into cleansing, clear-rinsing "sheets"—stops spotting as no other detergent can!

Compare two glasses fresh from the dishwasher rinse. Water drops clinging to the glass washed in another leading detergent can dry in ugly spots. But not a drop remains to spot the Cascade-washed glass. That's the magic of Cascade's exclusive formula. It changes water drops into free-flowing "sheets." And it leaves everything so slippery-clean, rinse water slides right off. Result: no water drops, no more water spots! Cascade gets glasses clearer, silver and china cleaner than any other detergent!

What's more, Cascade is safer than any other detergent — actually protects gold leaf and other delicate china patterns. So switch to new Cascade. You'll love it!

life, the parlor or sitting room open only for visitors. There was the iron or soapstone sink with the hand pump that brought water from the spring—where milk was also cooled. Here stood the foot-treadled sewing machine and the mending basket, the big table at which everybody ate the enormous early breakfasts, noon dinners and simple suppers.

"Everybody" usually included a widowed aunt, a parentless nephew, niece or cousin, and the hired man, a homeless widower, perhaps, or the strapping son of another farmer with more sons than he needed or could feed at home. They did not work for wages beyond pocket money. They shared a home. Grandmother, or sometimes great-grandmother, was often there, too, ensconced in a rocking chair, too old to do much but potter a little, wash dishes, peel vegetables, and tell stories to the children.

For this was another characteristic of the world of Grandma Moses. There was always room for one more. When original accommodations were exhausted, the menfolk took timber to the sawmill, traded it for sawed boards and siding, built another chamber, added an ell to the kitchen, broke a dormer into the attic and finished off a plastered room, mixing the sand-lime-and-water plaster themselves, so that the odd dormers and irregular juts of many old farmhouses record the growth of the family.

Who wants to live like that today?

Nobody does, and few, if any, could. But we are speaking of compensations—of the fact that with every gain something is lost.

The world of Grandma Moses was a world of free men, free in the deep sense of being independent, autonomous in themselves and able by themselves and with their families to meet every family need.

The land on which they lived, their homes, farms and animals, were their own, and what they produced was sufficient for themselves, to share with others, and to trade for the little else they needed. They were almost completely divorced from a money economy and the need of money.

In Vermont, where I have lived for four months every year for nearly a generation, I have friends, older men and women, who lived the earlier part of their lives just that way.

Some of them are living on the farms to which they went as brides or grooms thirty or forty years ago. But they are not the same farms, nor are they surrounded by other farms or their old neighbors. One of them recently recalled that when she married thirty-eight years ago, the farming community on the road-connected hills where her home stands numbered twenty-two households, all with large families, so that there were four one-room schools. Now only five families still hold on, elderly people, their children married or gone into other occupations. There is no school. There are no children to attend one.

What has happened to those farms? Two or three have been sold to "summer folks," for our town is very beautiful, with a salubrious summer climate and matchless autumns and Indian summers. These homes have been remodeled, but their land is returning to the wilderness out of which it was hewed, its crumbling stone walls reminding one of the infinitude of labor, individual and communal, that built them out of the stones of the fields that, like the forests, had to be cleared.

A great tract of them has been bought by a university that is timbering and reforesting it to afford the institution a perpetual income. But it no longer provides livelihoods for robust families.

The same story applies to the whole county, which, as far as the quality of land is concerned, is one of the better counties in the state. But the farm population has been dwindling year by year. In 1880 this county had 35,196 inhabitants and 4455 farms. In 1954 its population just topped 40,000, but there were only 1609 farms. Farm acreage had been reduced from 420,099 acres to 324,152, despite the increased size of the farms still operating. The production per man plus his machines per acre is higher today than in 1880, but farming as a way of life has radically declined.

There are still family farms, but the old economy is gone. The better homes are far more comfortable than the ones which I have described. They have electric lights, mechanical refrigeration, bathrooms, freezers, radios, television sets. In the barns are milking machines and sometimes mechanical feeders, and in the sheds stand tractors and hay balers, which have replaced the old draft animals.

Diversity of operation has given way to concentration. Instead of four or five cows, the farmer must have thirty, forty or preferably more to bring him in an adequate milk check, and their production must be copious and high in butterfat, requiring heavy grain feeding and high-protein hay. The farmer cannot afford to "waste his time" on a large vegetable garden. He must concentrate on his money crop, because, unlike his father and grandfather, he is perpetually in need of money.

His father could buy a good team of horses for $350 and they reproduced themselves, with a surplus of colts to sell, and provided fertilizer for his fields. They and their progeny never wore out or needed new spare parts. They were an inexhaustible capital. Now this farmer's son has $20,000 or more invested in machinery whose lifetime is not likely to be more than five years before it is turned in for greatly below the original price.

Who loves his country cannot hate mankind.
CHARLES CHURCHILL

The machinery consumes gas and oil, which the farmer cannot grow but must buy. It produces inadequate natural fertilizer for his need for high field production. This compels him to purchase commercial fertilizers, a recurrent annual expenditure which, for a 200-acre farm, will easily cost him $1000. He drives the land and is, in turn, driven by it, and there are champions of organic farming who believe the land is already taking its revenge.

He is controlled by inspectors, who can, at any moment, bar his milk from the market: if the cooler is not more than an exact number of feet from the milk barn, or if the electricity goes off in the cooler; if the manure is allowed to accumulate more than a certain length of time—and what does one do if it is impossible, because of weather, to spread it on the fields? The milk will not be accepted in any case if the bacteria count fails to meet requirements, so he wonders just why his every step must be ordered for him.

If the price of milk, or any other product he grows, falls in relation to what he must buy he is caught in the "cost-price" squeeze and bankruptcy looms. It is wonderful for his wife to have an electric or gas range, a washing machine, lots of hot water and an automatic furnace, but the installations are expensive and there is a monthly bill for them, whereas the fuel from the wood lot cost nothing in cash.

He cannot "trade in" his products at the local stores; they have their own suppliers and deal largely in packaged goods. He cannot retail his richly creamy milk to the villagers. Anyone can pasteurize milk at home, but to sell it retail the farmer must put up a pasteurizing-homogenizing plant, the price of which a medium-sized farm can never earn.

To get the largest possible cash income from his investments, the small farmer often "hires himself out" together with his machinery, digging ponds for large estates, and working on the public roads. Often his wife or daughters work out too. For the new home equipment must also be paid for and maintained. The farmer cannot say, as his father did, "No wife of mine will ever work for strangers."

How to make a good cup of Coffee!

Drip Maker

Rinse with very hot water. Never use less than ¾ capacity of drip pot. For each cup of coffee, bring to boil 6 fluid oz. fresh cold water (¾ measuring cup) in kettle or other pot. Put 1 Standard Measure (2 level tablespoons) of "drip" grind coffee, per cup, into filter section. Slowly pour vigorously boiling water into upper section. After dripping, remove upper section and stir. To keep hot: place over very low heat or on an asbestos pad over lowered flame. Do not boil. Serve as soon as possible. Because coffee is at its best only when fresh, do not re-heat it.

Vacuum Maker

Rinse with very hot water. For each cup of coffee, bring to boil in lower bowl 6 fluid oz. fresh cold water (¾ measuring cup). Never use less than ¾ capacity of maker. Use 1 Standard Measure (2 level tablespoons) of "drip" or "fine" grind coffee, per cup. Remove boiling water from heat. Fit upper bowl with filter over lower — twist tight. Place on reduced heat. When most of the water has risen into upper bowl, stir. In 1 to 3 minutes, depending on grind used and strength desired, remove from heat. Serve at once. (Rinse filter thoroughly and store in cold water.)

Percolator

Rinse with very hot water. Never use less than ¾ capacity of maker. For each cup of coffee, bring to boil in percolator 6 fluid oz. fresh cold water (¾ measuring cup). Put 1 Standard Measure (2 level tablespoons) of "regular" grind coffee, per cup, into basket. When water boils, lower heat, put basket into percolator, cover. Percolate very slowly for 6 to 8 minutes. To keep hot, place over very low heat or on an asbestos pad over the lowered flame — do not boil. Serve as soon as possible. And because coffee is at its delicious best only when fresh, do not re-heat it.

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

H. ARMSTRONG ROBERTS

When snow piles up on the highways, it's time for a good book.

If it is an old-fashioned snowy January, with the children out coasting, pink-cheeked and bright-eyed in the cold, with skiers careening down the white slopes and auto chains rattling outside on hard roads—then is the time to settle ourselves comfortably by the fire beside a pile of good books.

Of good books this month there are many. For one thing, Mr. Moto lives again. John Marquand, it seems, went to Japan a year or so ago, absorbed the throbbing life of present-day Tokyo, and has now incorporated it in STOPOVER: TOKYO (Little, Brown)—one of the best spy stories you could ever lay hands on.

This is the story of a U.S. Secret Service man in Japan tracking down an American believed to be a communist spy. The plot is by no means unfamiliar; there are murder, pursuit, constant suspense; a girl and romance, and a great many laughs. But how different it is from all the others, coming from the smooth, sophisticated pen of America's No. 1 novelist! It will restore your confidence in spy stories as superb entertainment.

THE LAST PARALLEL: A Marine's War Journal is obviously about war. But don't be put off! It is a remarkable book on many counts and has all the best elements of a novel—not only the tense excitement of battle, camaraderie, a fighting man's interest in sex, but something very deep and fine beyond all that, understated perhaps, but there, lying in the personality of the young author. For above all, this is the story of Martin Russ, twenty-two, and definitely of his day and age—a jazz enthusiast and trumpet player, equally knowing about a girl's looks and a record's playing, a boy well born and articulate, who has read and thought, and who, even at such an early age, has formulated something of a philosophy. This is his day-by-day journal, written in a ditch or behind a tree in no man's land, but written faithfully during front-line fighting in the Korean war. It is young and tough and rings necessarily with the vulgar idiom of marine ranks. But it has perspective.

This is not the usual complaining, cynical, tired, bored young man who sits down to write the definitive book about the war. Young people will recognize Russ as one of their own, and the older ones will marvel at the heights which this generation has managed to attain. (Rinehart.)

COUNT ROLLERSKATES, by Thomas Sancton (Doubleday), is something else again. There are those who may find it somewhat ridiculous. But this reader had a good time clear through. It is an old-fashioned melodrama with a fascinating background of little-known, across-the-tracks, low-class New Orleans.

It all happened about forty years ago when a titled European ne'er-do-well who was (of all things!) an expert roller skater came off a ship and found his way into a mild, respectable, middle-class family. The story spun out around him has everything—carnival, circus, street scenes, sentimentality, treachery; and should be a natural for the movies.

THE SINGLE PEBBLE, by John Hersey (Knopf), is a departure for the author of A Bell for Adano and The Wall—a simple story laid along the Yangtze River in China (where Hersey was born), about an American engineer and a river boatman and his young wife, and a stalwart young tracker—one of the forty trackers who haul the junk up through the river's dangerous gorges. Like many tranquil stretches on the stream itself, the story has hidden depths of meaning the reader may or may not wholly understand.

One good reason for reading THE TRIBE THAT LOST ITS HEAD, by Nicholas Monsarrat (Wm. Sloane–Morrow), is that it has been banned, we hear, in South Africa. Another is that the author of The Cruel Sea knows how to tell an absorbing story. Like most tales of Africa's primitive people in contact with British civil servants, this novel has its share of native orgies and European starved sex. But more important is the clear light it throws on the color problem, so vital these days throughout the world.

THE ETRUSCAN, by Mika Waltari, author of The Egyptian and The Dark Angel (Putnam), is true to type, a sound historical, readable novel, this time covering the entire known world of 500 B.C.—Greece, Persia, Rome, Carthage.

A more penetrating, and by the same token likely to be a less popular novel of ancient life, is LAST OF THE WINE, by Mary Renault. "We were there!" is your final reaction after the wars, the politics, the strange customs through which these pages lead you. This is Athens in the days when Socrates taught in the market place and Alcibiades was an up-and-coming young man. (Pantheon.)

I can't let January pass without mention of my favorite historical character. Benjamin Franklin was born January 17, 1706, and died in 1790. He wrote his own epitaph:

Its contents torn out,
And stript of its lettering and gilding)

MOTHERS ENFORCE CLEANUP OF COMICS ... North Platte, Nebraska

CAL BERNSTEIN

Bright covers of comics entrance this North Platte youngster as she makes her selection among the many on display. Gory crime and horror stories no longer are sold.

Vigilance Continues

By MARGARET HICKEY

Not all parents are satisfied yet with the type of comics being sold, as a North Platte, Nebraska, mother points out in this month's Public Affairs feature—but there has been a change for the better.

Commending the progress already made, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, which spearheaded a nationwide club movement against crime and horror comics, urges: "Continue to be vigilant; continue to watch the newsstands in your neighborhoods to see that the objectionable comic books—that any kind of objectionable magazines and paperbacks—are not there. Talk with the dealer about them and ask him to take them off his shelves and return them to the distributor. They won't be there next time if you do."

In Kokomo, Indiana, the Junior Department Club organized a local committee on the Evaluation of Comic Books, including five professional youth-work directors, four high-school boys and girls, and representatives from the P.T.A. and women's civic councils. Distributors co-operate readily with the committee's recommendations and remove from sale books rated objectionable. And in Arlington, Massachusetts, a committee of parents went from store to store checking bookshelves. Store owners, eager to earn customer good will and community respect, willingly cut out the crime, horror and sex comics.

In Canton, Ohio, citizens organized a book swap, collected 30,000 comics in one day by exchanging a "good" book for each comic turned in. This was the beginning of a drive which resulted in the cleanup of newsstands. In Santa Barbara, California, after a civic-minded news distributor discontinued the delivery of 60 comics, the P.T.A. and public library established a lending-book service in the city's grammar schools. Teachers report the demand for books is so great that children have little time for comics.

Good reading habits, like good manners, begin at home, and individual parents, by guiding, not pushing, by offering, not browbeating, can encourage real enjoyment in reading. And what better way than by reading aloud as a family activity, by letting a child start his own library at home, by discussing books together? Citizen groups can keep bad literature off the stands, but it is up to parents to see that their children get the best. END

"Got any 'hot' magazines, Pop?" the tall man with the cigar asked as he squinted around at the displays in the tiny store. He had scrupulously waited until the only other visitor in the place had left.

"No," the proprietor said, sizing up his caller as a seller of under-the-counter magazines. "And what's more, I couldn't get away with it in this town. The Junior Woman's Club would be after me in no time."

The newsstand dealer spoke from firsthand experience. It all started two and a half years ago, shortly after the North Platte, Nebraska, Junior Woman's Club undertook a crusade against crime and horror comics. His sales of comic books dropped by more than $1000 within the first few months, and pressure by the women was so great that he took crime books off his stand altogether. The clubwomen still keep an eye on the town's newsstands, and he is not taking any chances of being caught with lurid publications.

North Platte, a sales and distributing center in the heart of West Central Nebraska corn-and-alfalfa land, is one of some 300 towns in the state where clubwomen are working to cut down newsstand sales of crime and sex comics and encourage children to read good books. Started by one Nebraska woman, the effort is now part of a nationwide program inaugurated by the General Federation of Women's Clubs

It was just by chance that Mrs. Grace Barmore, then president of the State Federation of Women's Clubs, awoke with a start to the evil influence of comics on children. Mrs. Barmore, who with her husband operates a drugstore in Lexington, Nebraska, overheard a little golden-haired girl talking with her brother about how to spend their dime. As the little boy reached toward one of the bright-colored comic books displayed in the Barmore drugstore, his sister grabbed his arm. "Not that one, Johnny," she protested. "I can't sleep nights after I read it."

What in the world can be in that magazine? Grace Barmore wondered. She had never paid much attention to her stock of comic books. They were delivered by a distributor and placed on display racks by a clerk. As Mrs. Barmore turned the pages, her usually pleasant expression changed to a frown. She understood why the child couldn't sleep. One book's cover carried the picture of a monstrous-looking man with evil eyes leering from a green face all pock-marked, nostrils flared, and blood oozing from clawlike hands. He was bending over an attractive, well-developed and scantily clad young woman. The stories inside were equally gruesome—sadism, vampirism, cannibalism, grave robbing. Many portrayed eye gouging and torture. The next day, 80 per cent of the comics in the Barmore drugstore went back to the distributor.

Suppose hundreds of dealers began sending back objectionable comics, Grace Barmore speculated—magazine publishers would have to sit up and take notice. Grace Barmore always surprises new acquaintances with her vivacity and vitality. For despite the threat of crippling arthritis, the petite clubwoman is always on the go, constantly at work on some project. Now she was to undertake another. "We can't forbid certain comics to children when they can buy them at any corner store," she wrote presidents of women's clubs all over Nebraska, "but we can see to it that the worst are not available. Select a committee to check stands and ask the dealers to co-operate. Get parents, schools, churches and other civic groups to help you. Make a list of objectionable comics and also of those approved by the Cincinnati, Ohio, Committee on Evaluation of Comic Books, Inc."

That was in April, 1954. National officers of the General Federation of Women's Clubs had already evinced some concern about the increasing amount of filth on the newsstands. From a circulation of 10,000,000 a year in 1940, comic magazines had jumped to an estimated 100,000,000 a month. In May, Grace Barmore went to the federation's national convention in Denver, talked to women from all over the country about the influence of comic books and the need to protect the nation's children from their harmful effects. She found that in some communities women already had become alarmed and started campaigns similar to her own. At the end of the convention, the entire delegation took a floor vote to make the effort a national project. That was the cue for all 15,550 federated clubs in the country to go into action.

In North Platte, pretty, vivacious Mrs. Keith Blackledge, mother of two preschool-age boys, was one of the young women who began reading the comics for the first time. "I never expected to be shocked by a children's book," she commented as she volunteered for checking. With two other members, Jo Blackledge called on grocery-store managers showed them copies of the most objectionable comics and asked, "May we take these off your stands?"

The manager of a big chain grocery said, "I'll go you one better and take all the comics off. Every afternoon we have a big roadblock of youngsters hanging around reading comics—this would put an end to it."

A number of other stores stacked up the most objectionable books to be returned to the distributor and put up signs, "This store is co-operating with the Junior Woman's Club in the crusade against crime comics."

"I carry eight hundred different pocket books and eight hundred different magazines—including three hundred comic-book titles—so I don't have time to censor everything that comes in," a grocer said. "But if you say these are bad for the youngsters, out they go; they're not worth the profit."

But others were not so co-operative. All the objectionable magazines the groceries and drugstores removed reappeared at the bargain rate of three for 10 cents on the racks of one drugstore. When a delegation from the club entered the store, a clerk hastily gathered them up. "I wondered when you were coming," he smiled.

Another dealer pointed to a stack of comics too high for small children to reach. "Just the other day," he told Wanda Talcott, president of the Junior Woman's Club, "I refused to sell one of these crime comics to a ten-year-old girl. And an hour later her mother came in and told me to let the girl have anything she wanted."

Of course, Wanda and Jo had to agree, parents are as much to blame as publishers. They had been studying a list of comics prepared by the Cincinnati Committee on Evaluation of Comic Books and rated in four groups: no objection, some objection, objectionable and very objectionable. Perhaps, Jo and Wanda figured, if parents of all school children could see this list, they might take some notice of what their children were reading. (Of course not all would, Jo conceded. On her rare visits to a local beauty shop Jo remembered seeing women—mothers—themselves reading comic books. And several newsstand dealers had told her their best customers for comic books were adults.) With approval from the club, Wanda ordered 300 copies, at three cents each, of the committee's rated list, and passed them out at the club and at a P.T.A. council meeting. After a lively discussion, P.T.A. unit presidents decided to purchase enough copies to send home with every school child. One unit, low on funds, voted to mimeograph the list. Cody School and the junior-high P.T.A. felt it would be more effective to mail the list—with a personal letter—to parents.

A week after the first newsstand check teams of Junior Clubwomen made the rounds of stands again. They were elated to find that—so far—none of the most objectionable books were on display. They said nothing further to the dealers. Nevertheless, the club women were pretty sure their checking didn't go unnoticed. The following week, a second recheck was scheduled.

What about a local ordinance to control comics? Kearney, ninety miles east, was drawing up one, the clubwomen knew. But the city manager there admitted that enforcement would be a problem "because the police don't have time to stop and read the comics." More important than concentrating their efforts on legislation, the North Platte club decided, was to continue their work directly with parents and news dealers.

About this time Wanda Talcott had a caller. She had just finished house cleaning and was about to start out to market when her doorbell rang. A well-dressed man introduced himself, mentioning the name of a publishing company Wanda had never heard of. He said, "Now, Mrs. Talcott, you don't really think these comics are leading to juvenile delinquency, do you? After all, you live in a small town and can possibly know about the situation anywhere else."

"I've seen the kind of comic books they're selling," she shot back, "and I don't want my children reading them and don't think other children should either."

"I'll come right to the point, Mrs. Talcott," was his testy answer. "If you don't call off the crusade, you personally will have to face a lawsuit."

Wanda slammed the door and hurried to the telephone. She was more angry than alarmed, and when she reached Grace Barmore in Lexington she tried to sound calm. "But he couldn't sue you, Wanda," Mrs. Barmore reassured her. "He'd have to sue the whole General Federation, and he'd have five million irate women after him." But after ringing off, Grace Barmore herself went out to talk to a lawyer.

"It's only a bluff," the attorney said. "Why, I'd jump at the chance to defend the Woman's Club." This gave Wanda the final assurance she needed to continue the fight.

An editorial in the Omaha World-Herald commended the clubwomen for their crusade. But at the same time it warned that "unless the unofficial censorship by civic groups is continued, 'bad' comics will be back." Grace Barmore gave assurances "the drive is nothing that is going to blow over."

Members of the Junior Woman's Club went on talking before P.T.A. and other groups. Wanda Talcott called off a Sunday afternoon play practice with her church youth group to get off a letter asking merchants to keep crime comics off the stands permanently. The following week, her youngsters wanted to know where she had been and that precipitated a thoughtful discussion on comics. Several P.T.A. units conducted study groups to encourage families to discuss reading with their children. And in classrooms teachers began to inquire about outside reading. In a seventh-grade English class every hand but one went up when the teacher asked how many read comics. A bright-eyed scrubbed boy wondered why certain comics were on the "objectionable" list because "we like them. Besides, they're not real and can't harm us." His question was answered by another boy: "I don't think a man should be allowed to live a long time after being shot. That's pretty cruel." And a blond thirteen-year-old added, "My parents don't allow

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"I told you this morning, remember? You were supposed to eat dinner downtown."

Our town's most flirtatious young matron thinks every wedding ought to be re-enacted on its anniversary each year. "What a swell party!" she exclaims. "Pay off indebtedness, brace a sagging marriage, give the preacher a yearly fee!"

Just for the "thrill" a pair of our neighbors drove somebody's car to California. They had to pay for the gas, buy their airplane tickets home, but next year they aim to drive to Seattle, get free gas. (A three-car family too!)

"If I had the brass of my dearest friend," murmurs Betty Comfort, shaking snow off her rubber welcome mat, "I could exchange enough Christmas presents to buy myself a new wardrobe for our winter vacation."

Some radio and TV programs improve if you tune 'em down; some improve if you tune to another station; some you have to turn off and phone the station manager, more hurt than angry.

Why don't our beloved teen-agers let their pa and ma act modern? They seem to trap us in a medieval mood, as if we'd matured in the Middle Ages. My neighbor who keeps his car in a carport all winter thinks they resent up-to-the-minute 1957 impulses in a parent.

Our lawn, accuses my horticultural Dream Girl, is a disgrace, and she wants me to make it my 1957 project. This'll come easy as long as there's snow on the ground.

In our town the dominant passion is to watch our girls and boys toss a big ball through a horizontal hoop. We ex-basketball players of the rougher days agree that boys' basketball is louder, but girls' basketball is infinitely funnier.

Some of the house-trailer aristocracy deny it takes courage to live in a de luxe trailer. "What it takes is six thousand dollars," retorts one, "and since the Air Force pays for moving them to a new base, it's ideal for your Air Force lieutenant." And he can give it to me in my old age?

One day our youngest demanded his breakfast at 6:15 A.M. so he could get to Roosevelt High by 7 A.M. to rehearse a pep assembly. Ah, the spontaneous enthusiasm of youth!

I can't remember anything the American Legion's done that's aroused more enthusiasm among the wives than the 75-cent fish dinner they serve at the clubhouse in the river lowlands northwest of town. Those boys are maturing gracefully.

A few of our town's teachers have adopted the doctrine that if you write more slowly and legibly, you'll stabilize and calm your temperament and soothe your neuroses. But with a typewriter in almost every house, maybe it's too late.

"Maybe I thought of it too late," muses Peter Comfort, borrowing his snow shovel back from his neighbor, "but I wonder if Betty'd love me more if I bought her a five-dollar Christmas present every month instead of a fifty-dollar present once a year?"

Out in Fertile Acres they're organizing a baby-sitters' exchange. I suppose it's only fair for the mother of three babies to swap three hours for a two-hour "sit" by the mother of two babies?

Our youngest tells me positively it'll save our precious teen-agers from harm on the highways if we arrange "drag strips" elsewhere for 'em to race at 90 or 100 mph. Maybe, maybe, but it's a violent cure.

One of our town's stormier pairs divorced, then remarried each other. One child by each marriage, so they celebrate annually both wedding anniversaries, but nervously lest their youngsters learn about this curlicue in their family history. (I advise 'em to tell!)

We sat with coeds at a banquet at the state university, and helped the girls butter the leftover rolls and wrap them in napkins to eat later in bed. (What are a few crumbs in bed when you're still in college?)

I vexed an amiable P.T.A. lady when I confessed shyly that I enjoy Henry Mencken's writings more than John Milton's. I agree with only about a tenth of H.L.M.'s opinions, but Milton puts me to sleep before I can make up my mind.

My Lady Love's glass table filled with shells she's picked up on faraway sea beaches is prettier than mine lined with coins I've brought home from 60 countries. Hers is in the living room, mine in the attic.

The pretty high-school girl across the street tells me boys date more in junior high than in senior high school! This puzzles her, and I suspect it's purely a local phenomenon. (Or maybe by tenth grade they've learned all about women.)

I marvel at the spiritual lift my wife gets from having the windows washed. Now she can gaze through magic casements on faëry seas forlorn, or at least see whose delivery truck is in the driveway across the street.

My neighbor who lives above his son-in-law's three-car garage hates shops which aren't responsible for things left over thirty days. "What if I forget where I left it?" he asks indignantly. "Can't they send me a post card?"

We tried at the bridge table to think of a single case where a wife with a voice always pleasant and a sweet, gentle smile has been divorced, but there's apparently been no such court action in our town.

All summer the small cherubs played baseball on the governor's sloping and tree-studded lawn, and football all the autumn. But with snow on the ground in basketball time they're fairly baffled unless they can convert it into a ski run.

My wife is shocked to learn there are 150 hidden taxes in a woman's hat. "How can Lilly Dache make a living?" she asks. I suggest maybe some of the taxes are merely punitive.

At a fashionable dinner in our town recently four guests weren't drinking anything alcoholic and three others were mixing their own gentle concoctions. Maybe we're in for a renaissance?

. . . When our lieutenant's bride makes herself a $250 maternity wardrobe for $25 with her sewing machine,

. . . Or our son-in-law tips me off that the best way to butter corn on the cob is to wrap and spin it in a well-buttered slice of bread,

. . . And our youngest admits reluctantly that more kids still ride bikes to high school than drive cars,

. . . Or my Dream Girl is as proud of her vase of dried okra pods as a man who's shot a cougar,

Then I realize how happily I avoid the ruts a lone bachelor can get into.

Mothers of twins have to find short cuts!

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DR. SPOCK

"Some inexperienced parents get the idea that it's old-fashioned cruelty to get a baby on a schedule. But if 95 per cent of mothers of twins can do it in a couple of weeks, it can't be that bad."

CONSTANCE BANNISTER

Even "identical" twins are apt to start at different sizes and grow at different rates.

I want to tell you some of the things I learned myself from mothers of twins who have written me, which I think have a direct application to the care of single-born children.

A surprising proportion of the women were able to breast-feed their twins successfully for a number of months. They nursed them simultaneously and found this a tremendous saver of time and energy, as well as a great satisfaction. This reinforces my opinion that the primary difficulty nowadays is not that the breasts of many women are incapable of producing enough milk for one baby. Breasts are designed to produce what is demanded of them and will adjust just as easily to a large as to a small requirement. This basic problem is not the quantity of the milk. It is how to give American mothers the enthusiasm for nursing and the matter-of-fact confidence that they can nurse (some have enthusiasm and some have confidence, but not enough have both), and the right kind of encouragement from doctors, nurses, relatives and friends, so that the breasts' system of adjustment can work. Someday I'd like to discuss these other factors.

The mothers of twins find short cuts. They don't feel guilty about most of these because they are forced by necessity, they have no choice. Almost every mother writing, who fed by bottle, used a bottle-holder or propped the bottle on a folded diaper. A majority of them propped the bottle for one baby while they held the other, alternating babies at each feeding. A certain number, though, found this way impractical: the baby with the propped bottle either choked or soon lost the bottle. This necessitated laying down the babe in arms, who howled, while the mother went to the aid of the other. These mothers found that the practical system for them was to use bottleholders for both babies while they themselves kept both hands free to go to the rescue of either twin.

As all the bottle-propping mothers said, they simply had to do it anyway. Besides, they saved enough time to be able to give both twins attention and cuddling at other periods of the day, when the babies and mothers were not worried about feeding.

It has often been said, on general principles, that if a baby can't be breast-fed at least he can be cuddled in his mother's arms while he takes the bottle, and this will be good for both of them. But no one has proved that a baby who isn't regularly held in the arms for feeding is sure to be emotionally deprived to some degree. A good mother's love of her baby is shown to him at picking-up time, at diapering time, at bathtime, at playtime, at putting-to-bed time as well as at feeding time. The mother whose hands are too full at feeding time has plenty of other chances. However, I still think it's preferable to hold a baby for bottles during the first half year—at least until he shows signs of impatience with bottle-time cuddling—when it's possible. In this way his intense gratification from suckling and his faith in his mother have the opportunity to reinforce each other, as happens in breast feeding.

Under the press of time, many of the twins who had finished their feeding first were rolled onto their stomachs in bed to see if they could bring up their own bubbles while their mothers were busy with the second twin. Or the bubbles weren't bothered with at all in those cases in which bubbles never bothered the babies. Bubbling is certainly necessary if a baby swallows enough air to stop his feeding or to cause discomfort after meals. But there's no doubt that some babies are never bothered by the air they swallow and that burping them is only a ceremony, not a necessity.

Several self-confident mothers dispensed with changing diapers before feedings, thereby saving time when the babies were most impatient, and cutting down a great deal in laundry. This seems quite sensible to me. After all, young babies are wet three out of four hours anyway. Letting them stay wet an extra twenty minutes during feedings won't make that much difference, except possibly in the case of very sensitive skins. Most babies don't mind being wet so long as the wet area is wrapped in clothing and blanket. It's wetness exposed to the air that's chilly. The traditional diaper change before the feeding is really, I suppose, to make the mother feel more comfortable, because she imagines the baby will feel more comfortable. Of course the change after the feeding is important, not just to give the skin a short time to be dry but to remove the bacteria which have been multiplying there during the four-hour period.

A few mothers mentioned other ways to cut down on the diaper and bedding laundry. One invented a method of folding diapers (not described) in which there were many more thicknesses than usual where they were needed most (without hampering or overseparating the baby's legs) so that the diaper absorbed more of the urine and let little through to wet the sheet and pad. Also used were diaper liners at the times of day when bowel movements were expected, and an additional small pad and a small piece of waterproof sheeting (or the sheeting with fuzz on one side) laid on top of the regular sheet, pad and waterproof sheeting to protect them from wetting.

The feeding of solid foods presented quite a problem at first to most of the mothers of twins, in these days when solids are begun so early, long before babies can sit up. Most mothers at first spoon-fed one baby while the other drank a propped bottle, then reversed the process. Others propped both babies in opposite corners of a stuffed chair or in a feeding table built for twins. Several mothers said that the feeding table was the most valuable piece of equipment they had bought, next to automatic washer and dryer. They specified the type in which the angle of the seats is adjustable so that the baby who is nowhere near ready to sit up can be put in a semi-reclining position. The mothers emphasized that such a chair-table combination is useful not only at mealtime but at other wakeful periods when a baby will be content for longer periods if he is in a position to see what's going on.

A number of mothers saved further time in solid-food feeding by bunching all the solids into two feedings a day, and giving one solid meal by spoon, the other in bottle (cereal and fruit, for instance, mixed together with the formula in the 6 P.M. bottle, with a nipple hole as big as the head of a pin). Mothers of those single babies who are slow to catch on to solid foods often ask doctors if it is all right to mix solid foods in the formula and most doctors express a preference for feeding the solids separately. This is because a baby must learn sooner or later to swallow solids efficiently; and it is good, too, for a baby to learn early to enjoy different tastes and consistencies of food. But as these harried mothers of twins figured out, a baby can learn to swallow and enjoy solids on the basis of one experience a day and the mother can save time at the other feeding. I don't see why this isn't sensible for single-born

IT BURNS ME UP

Trying to shop for baby clothing is a nightmare of measuring, hesitating, buying, taking home and trying on, and running back to the store and starting all over again. My daughter's clothes are marked in six different ways (Small, 6 months, 12–15 lbs., etc.) and it's so confusing. Why not have a size scale based on actual measurements: x inches wide, x inches long, which all manufacturers could use? I'm sure sales would increase!

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know, editors you like, and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In January, 1907, the word "brainstorm" was coined by Harry Thaw's defense lawyers to explain why he murdered Stanford White. Trolley fares in New York were three cents; three servants' salaries came to $67 a month; and a new tune appeared, called I Will Marry Him to Make a Home for Mother.

"In the United States there are 19 Moscows, 21 Parises, 8 Liverpools and 13 Londons, and a perfect string of New Yorks and Brooklyns," complains Edward Bok in the January, 1907,* JOURNAL. *"Have we exhausted our beautiful Indian names?"

"Follow the conversation of intelligent people and it is astonishing how readily comes the exclamation, 'Ain't that pretty?' or 'Ain't that stunning?'" continues the JOURNAL's editor in chief. "Can't we drop ain't and the misplaced don't? Such as, 'He don't know'?"

"Short cuts: I wash clothes by first boiling them with kerosene in an old boiler," writes a JOURNAL reader.

"How I Manage Without a Maid: I call my younger son at 4:30 A.M., as he delivers morning papers. I rise at 5:15 and prepare breakfast with the help of my elder daughter. At 6:15 I call my elder son."

"A few drops of silver nitrate in the eyes of newborn infants will prevent much blindness," Helen Keller informs the women of America in this issue.

"In sweeping, I save a great deal of time by soaking newspapers in water. Wring them out, tear them in small pieces and lay around the carpet to catch the dust;" relates a reader.

Fashion note: "Skirts should touch the floor in front and on the sides, and in the back lie on the floor three inches."

"A wee man of two and a half wears the Russian box-pleated dress with bloomer trousers until he is six."

"For mending sudden leaks in galvanized washtubs, keep some chewing gum on hand."

"Don't lavish gifts upon your children as a compensation for your own shortcomings."

"The new dressy aprons for children are made of the sheerest linen batiste, full in Mother Hubbard style, hanging from a short fitted yoke of embroidery and lace."

"If you are subject to many headaches, cut off meat from your diet twice a day."

The Goulds in front of their Moscow hotel, the National, which stands across Red Square from the Kremlin and the Soviet shrine, Lenin's tomb.

Just as this issue was closing, Bruce and Beatrice Gould set foot, with intense delight and some relief, on American soil again after several weeks in Russia.

"We hear you're having very bad times in America—that there's much unemployment. Is it true you're worse off than we are?" was the commonest question they were asked all the way from Moscow to Simferopol on the Black Sea. (They had with them a young American who could speak Russian.) Many people patted their stomachs and said, "We have enough to eat now, what more can you expect?"

Shortages are still acute and fifty to seventy-five people queue up and wait in line for apples, milk, children's shoes. It is reported that a Russian official returned from prosperous Copenhagen solemnly saying, "They're desperately poor there. The windows are full of goods, but nobody's buying." . . . "How do you know?" he was asked. . . . "They can't be buying because I never saw a queue line."

But the Goulds' favorite story, picked up from a taxi driver in Leningrad and apparently cruelly current among the people since the Stalin deflation:

A little boy says, "Granny, what kind of a man is Khrushchev?" . . . "I don't know, dear. We won't know until he's dead."

From a bottom drawer Nancy Wood dredged a sheaf of photographs submitted eight years ago, of models who'd wanted to appear in Conversation Piece pictures. One that caught her eye she kept, to show us what a difference eight years can make. She gave us two guesses. No go. But on the back, in a square Philadelphia finishing-school hand, with waist and bust measurements, was the giveaway signature. "Grace Kelly," it said.

John Mason Brown* has been occupying the office next door off and on for months, and we'll miss seeing him in there bent over bound volumes of the JOURNAL. But we are delighted to have in our hands now The Ladies' Home JOURNAL Treasury that he has been compiling, and think you would be too. A generous sampling from seventy-five years of articles, essays, poems, advertisements, fashions, with of course a great collection of stories by everyone from Rudyard Kipling to Daphne du Maurier.

Since 1948 the JOURNAL's Traveling Art Exhibit of its finest illustrations has been shown in the clubs, colleges and museums of more than sixty cities in this country and Canada; practically a new collection every three years, though now and then there are holdovers by request, such as Bob Harris' inspired painting for See How They Run in the June, 1951, issue—remember? Here are Bob and Marge Harris in Bob's Scottsdale, Arizona, studio, and in between them you'll recognize the sketch for the illustration on page 34 of this issue for The Archbishop's Dilemma. It will be in the next Exhibit, which anyone can get who guarantees an audience.

The Harrises at home.

Elinor Goulding Smith*, whose Complete Book of Absolutely Perfect Housekeeping appeared here last March, came smiling in to see Mary Bass with a copy of the English edition. Diapers were now nappies; stoves were cookers; "My!" became "I say!" and "Say!" became "Gosh!" Permanents were now perms; paper napkins were taken out entirely, and iced tea (looked upon with horror over there) was served as lemonade. "I can't wait to see what they'll do," said Elinor to Mary, "with The Complete Book of Absolutely Perfect Baby and Child Care," which you'll be seeing shortly in the JOURNAL.

Margaret Davidson has just come back from the annual "Cooks' Tour" of celebrities' kitchens uptown at $5 per ticket for the benefit of the Parents League—a very good charity idea, in case you're looking for one. "Right beside the red-and-blue kitchen of the man who wrote The Seven Year Itch," Margaret reports, "the George Axelrods dine together on red velvet love seats flanking a white-brick fireplace. The kitchen of William Pahlman, the decorator," she went on, "is lighted by an immense brass chandelier. But the biggest kitchen of all belongs to Helena Rubinstein, the Princess Gourielli!" Seems that in spite of a steady stream of sight-seers through the Rubinstein kitchen, preparations were being made for a dinner party of fourteen. However, nothing fazed the Madame, as she is called. She showed Margaret how she fixed the fruit, and then undid her jacket with its gigantic sapphire-and-platinum pin, to show Margaret her dress. "What is your favorite dish, and your favorite dessert?" someone inquired. "Tripe à la Caen," the princess replied, "and lemon-meringue pie."

The Archbishop's

"I am going to marry Lady Patricia," he said. "I cannot marry her without the chalice. You perceive the conclusion, your eminence. . . . I shall have the chalice!"

By PATRICIA HAZLETT FINNEY

"Oh, Love!" mused the cardinal. "You give us more trouble than all the rest of the heathen deities combined."

Dilemma

The Cardinal Archbishop of Sonora sat on his shaded balcony, his well-kept hands clasped upon his breast, his feet stretched out so straight before him that the pigeon perched on the rail of the balcony might have seen full six inches of scarlet silk stocking. The cardinal was a small man, but very neatly made. His hair was white as spun glass. Perhaps he was sixty; perhaps he was seventy; perhaps he was fifty. His scarlet biretta lay upon a nearby chair. His head bore no tonsure. The razor of the barber and the scythe of time had passed him by. There was that faint tinge upon his cheeks that comes to those who, having once had black beards, shave twice daily. His features were clearly cut. His skin would have been pallid had it not been olive. A rebellious lock of hair curved upon his forehead. He resembled the first Napoleon, before the latter became famous and fat.

The pigeon's mate came floating through the blue sky that silhouetted the trees in the garden. She made a pretense of alighting upon the balcony railing, sheered off, coquetted among the treetops, came back again, retreated so far that she was merely a white speck against the blue vault, and then, true to her sex, having proved her liberty only to tire of it, with a flight so swift that the eye could scarcely follow her, she came back again and rested upon the farther end of the balcony, where she immediately began to preen herself and to affect an air of nonchalance and virtue. Her mate lazily opened one eye, which regarded her for a moment and then closed with a wink.

"Ah, my friends," said the cardinal, "there are days when you make me regret that I am not of the world, but this is not one of them. You have quarreled, I perceive. When you build your nest down yonder in the cote, I envy you. When you are giving up your lives to feeding your children, I envy you. I watch your flights for food for them. I say to myself, 'I, too, would struggle to keep a child, if I had one. Commerce, invention, speculation—why could I not succeed in one of these? I have arrived in the most intricate profession of all. I am a cardinal archbishop. Could I not have been a stockbroker?' Ah, señor and señora"—and he bowed to the pigeons—"you get a great deal nearer heaven than do we poor mortals. Have you learned nothing in your long flights—have you heard no whisper—have you no message for me?"

"Your eminence," said a servant who came upon the balcony, a silver tray in his hand, "a visitor."

The cardinal took the card and read it aloud: "Le Comte de Lubersac." He sat silent a moment, thinking. "I do not know him," he said at length; "but show him up."

He put on his biretta, assumed a more erect attitude, and then turned to the pigeons.

"Adieu," he said. "Materialism approaches in the person of a Frenchman. He comes either to buy or to sell. You have nothing in common with him. Fly away to the plaza, but come back tomorrow. If you do not I shall miss you sorely."

The curtains parted, and the servant announced, "The Count de Lubersac."

The cardinal arose from his chair.

A young man stepped upon the balcony. He was tall and lithe and blond and six-and-twenty. "Your grace," he said, "I have come because I am in deep trouble."

"In that event," said the cardinal, "you do me much honor. My vocation is to seek out those who are in trouble. When they seek me it argues that I am not unknown. You are a Frenchman. You may speak your own language. It is not the most flexible, but it is an excellent vehicle for the truth."

"Thank you," said the young man. "That gives me a better chance, since my Spanish is of the peasant type. I speak it mostly with my arms," and he began to gesticulate.

"I understand," said the cardinal, smiling, "and I fear that my French is open to some criticism. I picked it up in the provinces. My friends in the Vatican tell me that it is a patois."

"I dare say," said the young man. "I am a Parisian, educated at the Sorbonne."

"Ah," said the cardinal, "how unfortunate. Still, we may be able to understand each other. Will you have some tea? It is a habit I contracted in England, and I find it to be a good one. I sit here at five o'clock, drink my cup of tea, feed the pigeons that light upon the railing, and have a half hour in which to remember how great is England, and how much the rest of the world owes to her."

Cosmopolitan sort of chap, for a Mexican, thought the count. The cardinal busied himself with the teapot.

"Your grace," said the count finally, "I came here in trouble."

"It cannot be of long standing," said the cardinal. "You do not have the look of one who has passed through the fire."

He'd never really looked at her before... so he hadn't seen the heart she wore on her sleeve

By STANLEY ELLIN

My sister Harriet, who was going with me, came into the airline's terminal fifteen minutes before our plane was scheduled to leave La-Guardia. I didn't see her at first, but I knew she was there. Every male eye in my vicinity suddenly focused at a point beyond my shoulder. When I turned I saw for that one objective moment what the eyes were seeing—and a little more.

Harriet was a strikingly beautiful woman, but I have met a good many other women almost as beautiful who never managed to strike the response in men that she did. And every one of her thirty years of good living, everything Harriet had known in them—marriage, travel, a great deal of money—had been a means of rounding and polishing the beauty to a flawless finish. So Harriet not only looked beautiful, she looked expensive. Very, very expensive. And there is a magic to that all its own.

She came up to me in a whirl of mink and apologies, and kissed me affectionately on the cheek. "Billy boy," she said, "I haven't kept you waiting, have I?"

"No," I said, "you're right on time, as usual."

She fanned herself briskly with her magazine. "It was a mad rush, too," she said. "I had to go into the city to do some shopping, and the traffic just crawled. And the crowds! I don't understand how you stay sane, Billy. I really don't."

"Please," I said. "Let's not go into that."

"But why can't you live at home? The Island is just fabulous now."

I knew what was coming, and I didn't want any part of it. I started to walk quickly toward our plane, but Harriet was never one to give up easily. She slipped her arm through mine and tugged sharply.

"Billy," she said, "is it because of this last play?"

"Look, Harriet," I said wearily, "let's settle this at the start. I have now produced three flops in a row, and I know the kind of triumph father is enjoying at seeing his blackest predictions come true this way. But I happen to be doing what I want to do. Going into the grand old family business as father's partner, or living at home, would be all wrong for me. Is that clear?"

"You're underestimating father by a good deal."

"I am not underestimating father. Nobody could. I am merely trying to explain something which you seem incapable of understanding."

She turned bright pink. "Maybe I understand much more than you realize, Billy. You went into theatrical production against our advice, you've done wretchedly at it, and now you're ashamed to admit that it was all a mistake. Or too stubborn. And that's what's been making you so grim and edgy every time I see you, isn't it?"

"No," I said. I was going to say much more, but then I gave up. It was useless really.

By the time the plane was pushing through the first cloud banks beyond the Hudson, Harriet was in a brown study, her eyes fixed unseeing on the window; so I busied myself with the playscript I had resolved to read during the weekend. I was plowing through the murky complications of the second act when Harriet stirred herself.

"I suppose Wade will meet us at the field," she said.

"He said he would."

Harriet looked at me curiously. "How did he sound when you phoned to tell him?" she asked.

"How did he sound?"

"You know what I mean. When you told him I was coming along."

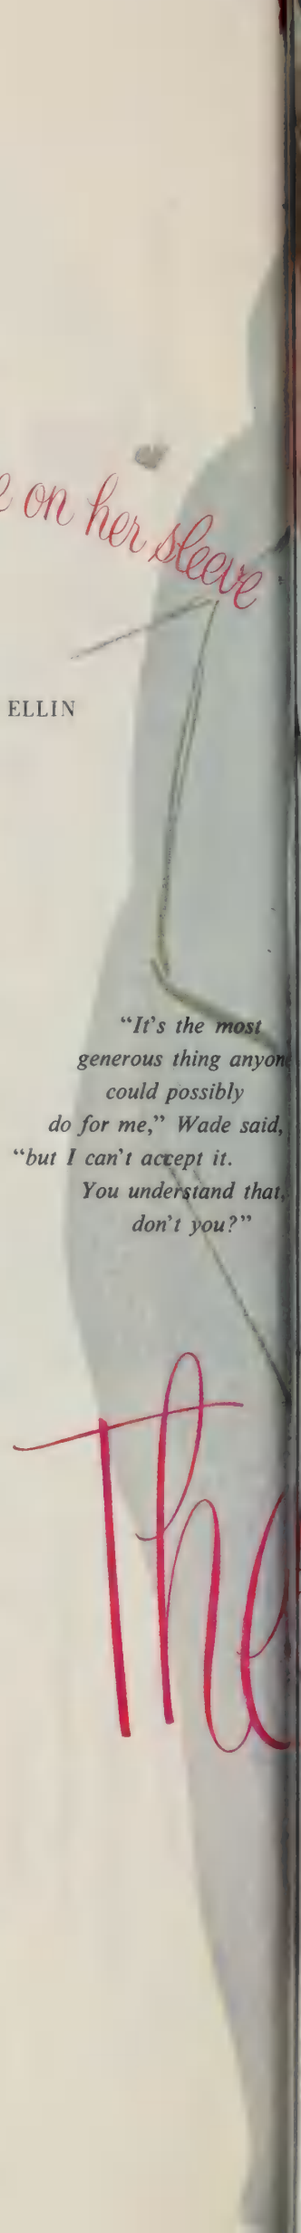
"Oh, that. Well, he did ask if you were still as pretty as ever. I guess he remembers you, all right."

She dropped her head back against her seat and looked up at the ceiling of the plane with a little smile. "What's Kentucky like, Billy?"

"I think it's colored pink on the maps."

"I'm not fooling. I want to know."

"I'm not fooling either," I said. "After all, I've never been there myself."



I couldn't get back to the playscript after that. I never had been to Kentucky before, but I did know what it was like. You couldn't be Wade Cochran's roommate at college and not know.

In a lot of ways he was quite a character in school, Wade Cochran: a big, rangy football player who made a couple of All-Americas and hated the game; always broke, and never would borrow a nickel. And in his last year at college he found himself rooming in the swanky Alpha house with William Voorhies III of the North Shore Voorhieses, and wasn't a bit impressed.

I didn't know all this at the time, because the first month or so we were together in the room I don't think we said more than a dozen words to each other. I was pre-law and working overtime as director of the class play; Wade was School of Commerce and always at football practice. It wasn't the kind of arrangement that helps roommates get to know each other. We slept in the same room, and occasionally did some studying across the same desk, but that was about all.

It was a letter Harriet sent me that provided my real introduction to Wade. Harriet's letters came religiously once a week, and were, I suppose, part of the maternal role she chose to play so intensely ever since mother had died. Usually there were five or six pages in a small precise hand about various family matters, few of which mattered to me at all. This letter was different. It was much longer than usual, and it was entirely devoted to the subject of our younger sister, Gretchen.

Father, it seems, was furious, because Gretchen, after only two months at Miss Wilbraham's Academy, had left the school. That is, she had not exactly left of her own volition, nor had the school really expelled her, but Miss Wilbraham had explained to father that Gretchen CONTINUED ON PAGE 102

"It's the most generous thing anyone could possibly do for me," Wade said, "but I can't accept it. You understand that, don't you?"

Can Love be Learned?

Every marriage begins in happiness;
how can a husband and wife learn the patience, the understanding, the mutual faith and trust that will turn and strengthen that first romantic love into a truly happy "ever after"?
"People know far more about cars than they do about love."

A JOURNAL FORUM

FORUM PARTICIPANTS

"The whole problem of marriage really amounts to the question: What is love and can one learn something about love?"

DR. ERICH FROMM, psychoanalyst; professor, National University of Mexico; trustee, William Alanson White Institute, New York

"If you would send me to the blackboard and ask me the answer to all our problems with children I would just write: 'Mother, Mother, Mother.'"

MISS IRENE DUNNE, (Mrs. Francis D. Griffin), star of stage, screen and television, Los Angeles, California

"Teen-age marriages are exposed to so many pressures, financial as well as emotional, that the divorce rate is decidedly higher than for people who wait until their middle twenties."

DR. CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Department of Psychology, Pennsylvania State University

"I'd rather take in washing and stay home in any real financial need because I feel I'm better equipped to handle my children than anyone else."

MRS. JULIA B. ASHENHURST (Mrs. Robert L.), mother of four children, West Newton, Massachusetts

"The man today is supposed to be a combination Clark Gable and Gregory Peck and send his wife into ecstasy every time he looks at her. The doctor can help resolve faulty attitudes toward sex."

DR. JED W. PEARSON, JR., Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology, The George Washington University School of Medicine, Washington, D.C.

"Too many young people today feel that marriage is something that can be set aside if they don't like it."

DR. RANDOLPH RAY, rector, Church of the Transfiguration (Little Church Around the Corner), New York City

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Today the modern partnership of marriage is demanding more and more of people. It is hard for two young people with stars in their eyes to realize that behind every happy marriage there have been struggles to overcome personality differences, money problems, child-care difficulties, in-law troubles. They need help in how to handle these problems—help in turning their own romantic dreams into a happy, healthy family group.

So today we are going to see what can be done for our young people. Our panel includes many viewpoints: we have a psychoanalyst, a doctor of medicine, a judge of the domestic-relations court, a marriage counselor, a minister, a career woman and mother and, last but far from least, a young housewife and mother of four children.

So let us begin by asking, first, what are the effects on society of the broken marriage? Why is it important that we have successful marriages? Dr. Fromm, would you begin?

DR. FROMM: Well, I would rather talk about the effects of the broken marriage on people than on society—because to me society is nothing but people. And I would like to talk about the unhappy marriage as well as the broken marriage.

To me, the main importance of marriage is that people love each other. In the broken marriage and the unhappy marriage, the worst effect is that children grow up who have never seen anyone who loves somebody else in the world in which they live.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: And you feel that this example in the early years of a child's life, of a loving warm relationship ——

DR. FROMM: It is something basic for the child. For people.

The whole problem of marriage really amounts to the question: What is love and can one learn something about love? People know far more about cars than they do about love; they try to be more precise about cars, to understand them—for instance, we have many more words to describe cars than we have to talk about love. Anything short of hate is called, in our language, love. There is nothing specific by which one agrees to mean love.

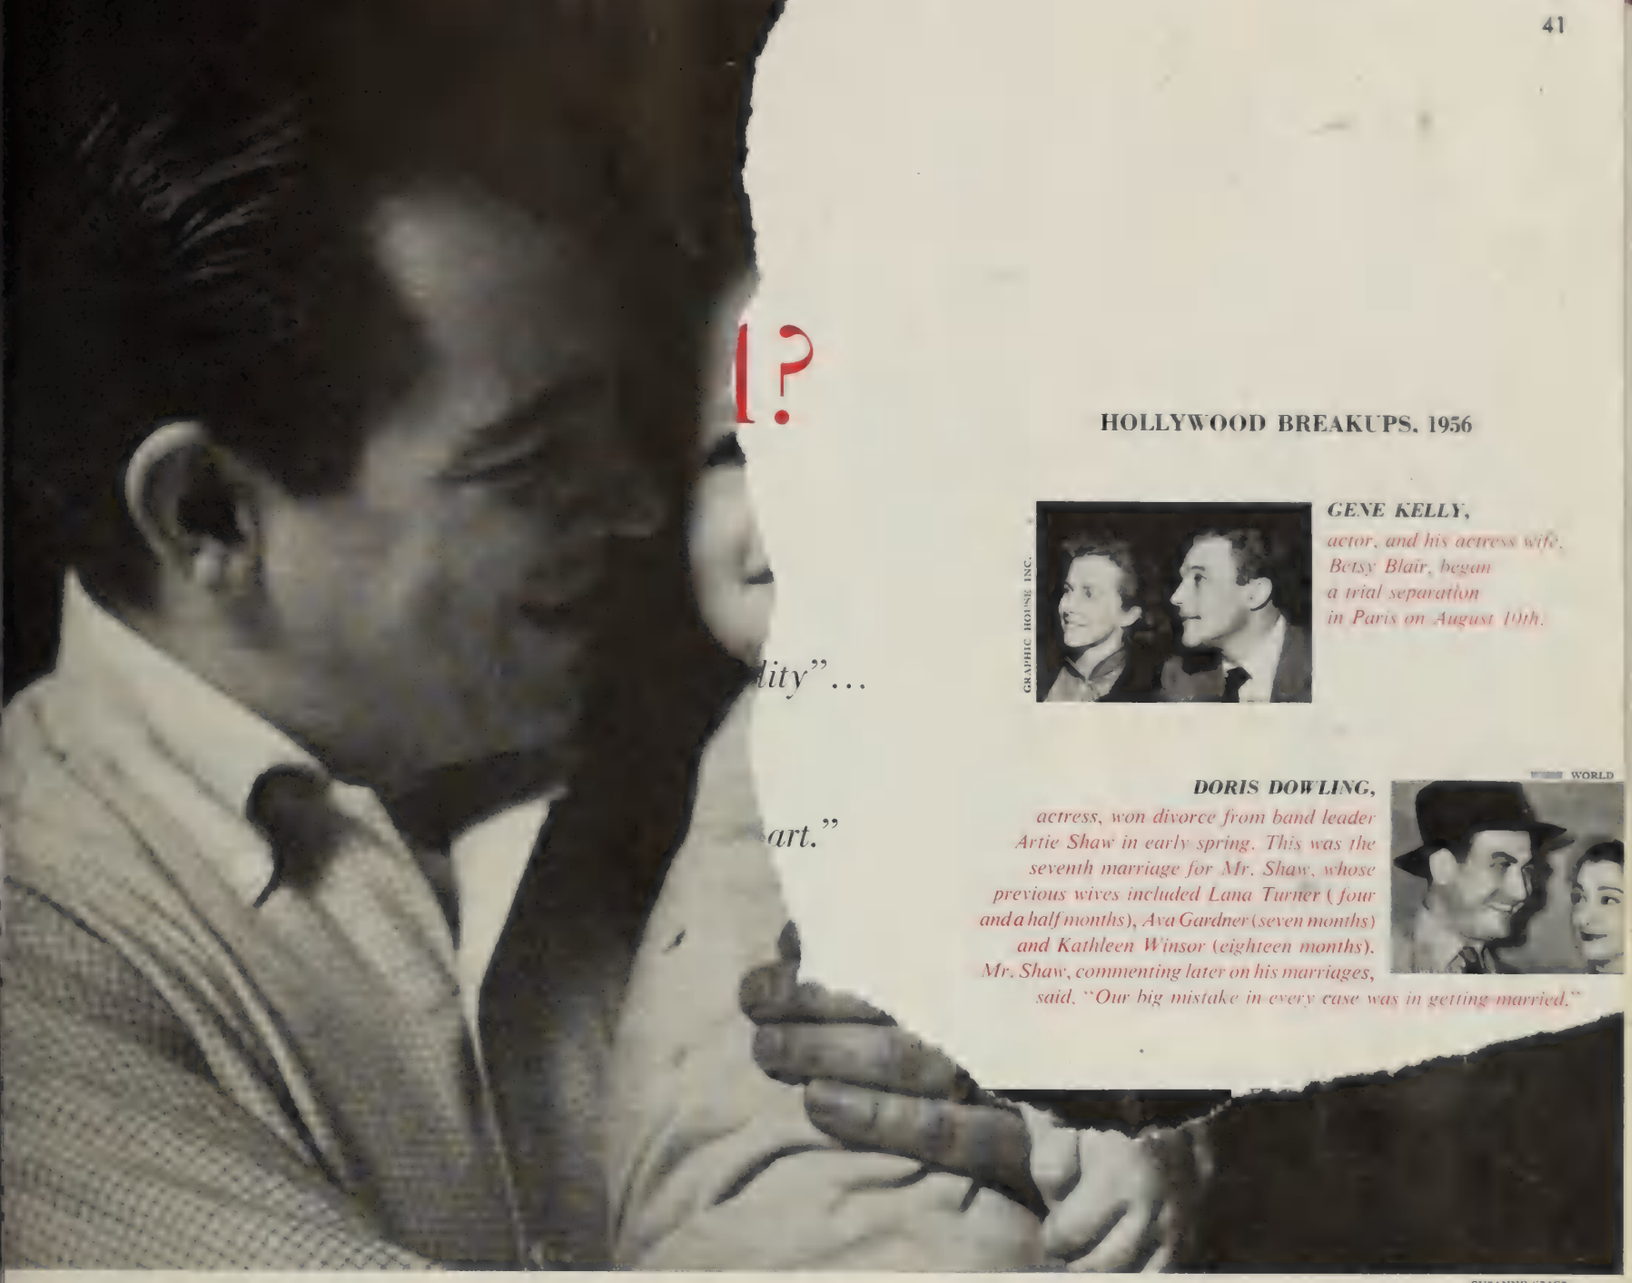
DR. PEARSON: Are you speaking of physical love or spiritual love or both? I don't quite follow you.

DR. FROMM: The separation of the two is already a problem. I was speaking now of what I think is love—the sense of oneness with another person, which at the same time retains the separateness and integrity of the two, or, if you prefer, the individuality of each.

JUDGE POLIER: I see the difference between a happy, loving home and an unhappy one as a difference in atmosphere. For the child, this atmosphere can be pure and stimulating and warm and helping him to be all that he can be—or it can be a cold, frightening atmosphere where people are resigned toward one another, tolerate each other, or are in conflict with one another continuously.

We tend to think of the broken home solely as the one in which divorce, separation or desertion has taken place, but a home that is broken emotionally is just as disturbing, and sometimes more so, to the child.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Dr. Adams, what are the facts about broken marriages today? How many broken homes do we really have?



DR. ADAMS: Well, the broken homes cannot be counted on all levels of society simultaneously. For example, if you consider college graduates and the socioeconomic stratum they represent, then we could say our divorce rate is only perhaps 10 per cent. On the other hand, if we consider the divorce rate plus the desertion rate of the low-income groups of our population, we find the breakup rate is 50 per cent. So, crossing these two together we say it

"There is nothing worse for a growing boy than having the mother make all the decisions without the father really participating."

eneral that our broken marriages number bout one out of three.

DR. FROMM: But I think that the main reason hy there are fewer divorces among people ho are better off financially is not that there is ore love and happiness among people of these oups, but rather that there is a social investent, a prestige which exists in the unbroken arriage which is not considered as important nong people who are unemployed or sick or or.

JUDGE POLIER: Would you not add an economic investment too?

DR. FROMM: Yes, there is also a greater economic investment and other factors of a purely cial nature which have nothing to do with e happiness and love of the marriage. So I ant to stress that just because people are not vorced or separated that, in itself, is no sign a happy marriage.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Dr. Ray, in talking with oubled people who come to your church, hat do you find are some of the chief causes a marriage breakup?

DR. RAY: Of course you know that my urch is what is called High Church piscopal and we are very careful about marriage. No one can be married in the church unless they have gone through a series of instruction or if either party has been divorced. But still, when a breakup comes I find that largely it is because there is a lack of responsibility. Too many young people today feel that marriage is something that can be set aside if they don't like it.

Lack of a common culture, or background, is another cause. Mixed marriages both of race and religion present great difficulties even when the husband and wife share common interests. Often I see a couple who I think haven't a chance—but they don't seem to care.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: You think today, then, that there are too many people rushing into marriage without really caring about some of the social and cultural factors that formerly were given a lot of attention?

DR. RAY: Yes, and you used to depend on their parents for help with that sort of thing, but today too many of the parents are more interested in the other things they are doing than in their children.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Miss Dunne, would you care to comment on that?

MISS IRENE DUNNE: Yes I would, for I feel that when you talk about preparing for marriage you are talking about something that should begin in infancy, in the cradle, because to me the preparation for marriage is just the development of character, and character, regardless of all the work of the schools, must begin in the home. For if a child is brought up in a home to be charitable and unselfish, why, love grows out of that quite naturally.

And I think, too, with Dr. Ray that so many of the young people today seem to lack a sense of responsibility—especially the boys, who used to think they had to have a good job before they could get married.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: And today you think they don't?

MISS DUNNE: Of course I have brought up a girl and I seem to view everything from the girl's angle, but I do think an economic foundation is important. I would imagine in the old days in Europe, families were held closer together because of religion.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Judge Polier, how do you feel about this?

"The whole problem of marriage really amounts to the question: What is love and can one learn something about love?"

DR. ERICH FROMM, psychoanalyst; professor, National University of Mexico; trustee, William Alanson White Institute, New York

"If you would send me to the blackboard and ask me the answer to all our problems with children I would just write: 'Mother, Mother, Mother.'"

MISS IRENE DUNNE, (Mrs. Francis D. Griffin), star of stage, screen and television, Los Angeles, California

"Teen-age marriages are to so many pressures.

arland, Sonja
Henie, Jeanne Crain, Victor Mature, Tyrone Power, Cary Grant, Jane Wyman, Shelley Winters, Jeff Chandler, Ava Gardner, Frank Sinatra, Lana Turner, Marilyn Monroe, Gregory Peck, Susan Hayward, Betty Hutton, Elizabeth Taylor, Mickey Rooney, Jose Ferrer, John Wayne, Olivia de Havilland, Leslie Caron.

But why? Why do the marriages of so many charming people so often go awry? For an answer, this reporter went to Hollywood and talked not to the stars, whose heartbreak is private, but to the people who work with the stars, who observe the glamour and the tension from the side lines, and draw their own conclusions. The experience was illuminating, not only of marriage in Hollywood but of marriage in general.

The hairdresser was large and middle-aged. Her yellow curls were a skillful demonstration of her own art. In her face were warmth and wisdom, garnered perhaps by twenty-five years of listening to other women, many of them movie stars, talk of their troubles. The shop on Sunset Boulevard was closed for the day, and she sank with a grateful sigh into the manicurist's chair.

"You know what happens to these marriages?" she began. "A girl's an extra or may a starlet. But when she's nineteen or twenty, marriage looks more important to her than a career. So she marries the boy, and they settle down and are happy. But after a few years quite a lot of things happen. He rises in the movie business, and gets absorbed in it. He starts coming home at night and saying, 'Oh, boy, what a beautiful doll we hired today! What a figure, what a face, what hair! What a doll!'

"Then the young wife stares at herself in the mirror and she's still pretty, but she's too busy with the house and the children to look like a movie actress any more. Every time she had a baby she put on a little weight, so now she rushes to the doctor and wants him to take it off right away. He tells her to go slow, but no, she wants it all off right now, this week. So she starves herself and keeps starving herself back into size nine or ten dresses. Not only is this bad for her health and her temper, but severe dieting diminishes sexual ardor, and the wife doesn't want to sleep with her husband any more.

"But she still wants to prove she's as good as those girls on the set he keeps raving about, so she goes back into the movie business. She comes in here for a hair job, and if she's a blonde she says, 'Put more fire in it.' 'You don't want it red, honey,' I tell her. 'Yes I do,' she says, 'I want to blaze.' So then she blazes away at her career and the kids are neglected and the husband doesn't have a decent home or a happy sex life. And pretty soon there's a divorce.

"You know, there's an ugly girl comes in here to get her hair done. She's no star, but her husband's a big producer and meets the most glamorous girls in the business. One day he came to pick his wife up here, and we saw he was the most gorgeous hunk of man we'd ever seen. So the next time she was in, I asked her frankly, 'Honey, how come you ever got such a gorgeous hunk of man, and how come you can hold him with so much competition?' 'I'll tell you,' she says, 'I just make love to him every day. That's how I got him away from his first wife, and that's how I keep him, and that's how I'm going to keep him.' They're still married.

"If you ask me, most of these marriages break up because the actresses aren't as wise as my ugly customer is."

Shrugging her shoulders with Spanish eloquence, the hotel maid described what it had been like to work for a four-times-married movie queen: "All the time she say to that husband then, 'Look, I making the money, see? And we gotta go this producer's party tonight and if you don't like it you know what you can do!' Many times I hear her talk like this to him, and I think, 'You big movie star but you don't know much about men as I do.' And sure enough, one day he leaves her for a nice girl, not movie actress. And then she cry a lot and maybe drink too much and get divorce. Now she married again, I hear, but I don't like work there no more. You know what? I think maybe she only know how to love herself, not any man."

A marriage counselor who has helped many of the stars: "So many of them have not had time to acquire background, or standards. Many still struggle with youthful immaturity, and difficulty in understanding the needs of another person. Often they are emotionally unprepared to handle the vast amounts of money and fame and flattery which come their way. They feel guilty, they feel they haven't deserved all this. This makes them tense and irritable.

"But the real trouble is that most of the movie people are so busy they don't have time for sympathy, sharing things, or enjoying their children together. These are the factors which help preserve a marriage."

The psychoanalyst looked just as he should—gray, twinkling and sympathetic. One could understand why so many movie people seek him for help and advice.

"If they could just get away from all the vultures who live on them, they might be all right," he meditated. "I have a couple now, famous stars who are just breaking up. I might get somewhere with them by themselves, but these two people have six other people pulling at them: her agent and his, her business manager and his, her lawyer and his. These people sit round the table and discuss the kids as if they ere waxworks—and all these men are really ncerned about is their five or ten per cent. "Men like these—and there are hundreds of em in the industry—are carrion vultures. ithout them many of the movie couples might ve a good life and a good marriage. They are pable of being mature, but these businessmen ake them dependent, and you can't be de-ndent emotionally and develop maturity.

"Most of them are simple, good people to be-n with—but the glamorizing gets them, and lls them into a vicious circle. As movie stars ey are expected to live a certain way. They ve to make money to live that way. They st get publicity to make money. They must what their press agent tells them to get pub-city. Many press agents feel that gossip about isbehavior is better box office than news of a ppy home life ever could be. The actor or ac-ss starts out to get publicity, and ends up tting a divorce.

"There's something in the cultural climate of is place which breaks up marriages. There's mething in the outdoor climate too. There e very few rainy days to sit by the fire, or cold ghts or snow to keep couples indoors to-ther. There is no reflective quiet, such as that rust upon couples in less sunny climates.

"I am treating an actress, and a good one, ho told me that the other night the actor she's w dating came around and wanted to go out ith her to one of the smart Hollywood res-urants. 'I have a steak here and I'll cook it for u,' she told him. 'I'm tired and I'd like to stay me and just talk.' He looked at her in amaze-ent. 'What are you doing, going corny on me?' raged. She now understands that marriage ith this man would not be a good idea.

"Most of them, of course, live in a myth. Even the psychoanalyst's couch they can't stop ting—not just the role they're playing at the me, but the role of themselves as 'the great star.' A good performer doesn't know when he's acting and when he's living—and it's hard to be married to someone who can't tell the difference between reality and unreality.

"Another important factor, the one which creates most of the misbehavior, is their tremendous need for ego satisfaction and their tremendous insistence that they must have freedom even in mating and in motherhood and fatherhood; their insistence that they are special individuals who can do whatever they please.

"A stage actor has a better chance to get the need for ego satisfaction out of his system, every night for two or three hours on the stage—therefore he can separate from his role more easily than a movie actor can. A movie actor never has the ego satisfaction of really, truly living a part. The way a movie is made, scattered scene by scene, he gets only little bits of takes—and that's the way they live their lives at home, in little bits of takes.

"Down under all this they are just ordinary people—some lovable, some psychopathic, some who have put up tremendous personal fights. Probably no more than twenty-five per cent really get into behavior trouble, but they are the ones who set the Hollywood culture.

"You know, we all expect too much from them—we want them to be smarter and better and wiser than we are. But these people are the same in their abilities and strengths and characters as other people. They just have more pressures on them.

"If there are any happy marriages in Hollywood, it's a miracle. Almost everything is against them right from the beginning."

The pretty movie extra, who has been hovering in the wings for the last ten years, put it even more strongly: "I can't think of even one happy marriage in Hollywood," she declared. "My first marriage broke up when I discovered my CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

the Diet that turned me into a Model

From forlorn fatty—to fashion model.
Pretty Linda Rand tells how she dieted and lost 65 pounds to become a happy bride, as well as a popular model!

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor of the Journal

Linda had started her diet, weighed approximately 155 pounds when these pictures were taken. Her pretty features were lost in puffs and rolls of fat. "I didn't know how to wear clothes, fix my hair or put on make-up—and as a fatty, I didn't bother to learn."

Linda the fashion model—bright-eyed, tiny-waisted, 110 pounds. "My outlook on life has improved 100 per cent. Nowadays, I love to do things, to be with people, to join the fun. Every time I see a young girl who is overweight, I want to tap her on the shoulder and say, 'Let me tell you about my own life as a fatty—let me help!'"

Ever since my teens, I've thought of what fun it would be to be a model. I'd talk about it with other girls, over a hot-fudge sundae, and when I was alone I'd munch on cashew nuts and daydream about posing in pretty clothes. "How exciting it would be," I'd say to mother, helping myself to seconds on mashed potatoes and gravy, "to earn a living in such a glamorous way!"

As you can see by those old pictures of me, there appeared to be as much chance of my becoming a model as, say, becoming President of the United States. In four years of gorging, I turned myself into nothing more than a model fatty.

My overeating began when I went away to boarding school. In my freshman year I weighed 125 pounds and wore a size 11 dress. But by my senior year I had expanded to 175 pounds and wore a 17. I'm the only senior in our class picture turned sideways. The photographer said that that angle would be more "flattering" to me. All the girls giggled, and if a person could die of embarrassment I wouldn't be here to tell my story.

I know it isn't unusual for girls to feel lonesome and unsure of themselves when they are away from home for the first time. Smart girls overcome this feeling by making an extra effort to make friends and by being active in various school activities. Instead, I fought loneliness with extra food. When there was no one close to talk to or confide in, I ate. Later, when I felt at home in school, I continued to overeat. Not because I was lonesome, but because I was sorry for myself for having eaten so much and got so fat in the first place!

School food, as any girls knows, is not what you could call calorie deficient. Our meals were delicious, but it would require unshakable determination from a food-loving girl to maintain a tidy waistline when confronted with such goodies as macaroni and cheese, pecan pie and all the blueberry muffins you want. Other girls ate modestly. But I always sat down to each meal as though it might be my last.

Hockey was my favorite sport, and you would think I could have worked off some of that extra weight through exercise. But it was always doubtful about whether I could continue on the team. We had our hockey uniforms made to order in our school colors of brown and yellow. From the time my measurements were taken to the time my uniform was finished, I would have grown out of it. Clothes were always a problem. The other girls would extend their wardrobes by borrowing from one another. No one ever lent me a dress, knowing I would stretch it out of shape.

Naturally, I was never a belle. I would be invited to class parties because it was a school rule that everybody had to be invited. But that was where my "popularity" ended. My most stimulating occupation at such affairs was to sit alone on the side lines and count the number of couples on the dance floor. It was humiliating, and the only thing that saved me from tears was the thought of the chocolate layer cake hidden away in my room to have afterward.

Even my roommate tried to encourage me to diet. "I'll diet with you," she exclaimed. We bought a box of those candies which are supposed to take the edge off a fatty's appetite. The directions said to take one before each meal. This is it! I said to myself. I'm on my way at last! But the trouble was, my roommate and I ate the whole box of candy in one afternoon.

As I continued to bulge and burst at the seams, the headmistress called me into her office. "Linda," she said, "won't you make an effort to control your appetite? Do it for the sake of your own pride and happiness. You could be one of the most attractive girls in school." Unfortunately, I mistook this kindly advice for a scolding and ignored it. She even assigned me to a special dining table where smaller-portion, nonfattening meals were served to overweight pupils. It didn't help. We just giggled at our plight, and made up for the sweets we couldn't have at the table by buying them after school at the campus store. In fact, I spent so much time in that store, I got an afternoon job there. Officially installed behind the candy counter, I went right on eating—to my heart's discontent.

I wish I had been as clever in my schoolwork as I was in working out ways to wangle food. It was a school rule that no pupil could eat during study periods. I got around this by taking cough drops with me. I would cough enough in those forty-five-minute periods to use up a whole box of drops. It's a wonder I wasn't sent to a sanatorium.

During school, I corresponded with a boy back home who had known me when I was slim. I had always had a crush on Tom and was thrilled at the idea of seeing him after graduation. For the big reunion, I wore a flowered dress which made me look even heftier than I was. Tom had planned to take me to a party, but when he saw me he changed his mind. "Let's go to a movie instead," he suggested. I knew he was flabbergasted at the change in my appearance and embarrassed about having his friends meet such a fatty. Needless to say, our date was a flop. Tom never called me again.

In fact, no one called me. I knew, from the other girls, that parties and dances were going on all around me, but my telephone never rang with an invitation. Dismal and discouraged, I made halfhearted attempts to reduce. In six months of my self-imposed "dieting" I lost only seven pounds.

It wasn't until I went to my doctor for a routine annual checkup that I was jolted into seeing myself as others were seeing me. After my examination, my doctor said, "Your health is excellent, Linda, but you are wasting your youth. At an age when you should be having wonderful times with other young folk, you settle for sitting at home with candy bars in both hands. I feel sorry for you, but I'm cross with you too. It's your own fault!"

Linda Kaye, reducing diet

A TYPICAL WEEK

Unless otherwise specified, all servings are medium portions.

Linda is not a milk drinker. Though milk is occasionally included in her diet in custards and on cereals, she did not get at least one pint of milk a day, which the JOURNAL feels is important, especially for young people. We suggest to readers who have their doctor's approval of dieting, and who plan to use Linda's diet as a guide, that you include two 8-ounce glasses of nonfat milk in your daily eating plan. This will be adding approximately 170 calories to the total daily calorie count. Linda's diet, with the inclusion of the milk, is a nutritious reducing diet of approximately 1100 calories a day.

THE SCAPEGOAT

by DAPHNE du MAURIER

"I'll think of something," I said, "but remember we must be careful." Jean de Gué himself could not have spoken with greater duplicity.

SYNOPSIS OF PARTS I AND II On my last week of holiday in France, I stopped in Le Mans for lunch, thinking that once again I should return to London without having been close to these people whose history I taught and whose language I spoke as my own.

Suddenly someone jogged my elbow—I stared. My double. My very self. "You don't happen to be the devil?" asked Jean de Gué, introducing himself. We had a cognac, then another, and I learned he had been in Paris on business and dreaded returning to his family because he must report failure. "People live by greed. You must give them what they want, but they are never satisfied." I was lucky, he said, to be alone.

When the cognac haze lifted I was in a hotel room, all my belongings replaced by De Gué's. His chauffeur waited at the door, responding with a sad smile to my protestations that I was not le Comte de Gué. Still groggy, I was driven to the château, and before I could extricate myself I was on to greedy maman, faithless spouse to Françoise and beloved papa to little Marie-Noël. I had brought maman a mysterious small package she was avid to have, and gifts for the others; sister Blanche ignoring hers as she ignored me, brother Paul made angry by his and by the strange choice of his wife Renée.

My attempts to explain, even to the aging curé, came to nothing and—hardly knowing why—I accepted the role. Visiting the family-owned glass foundry, I led Paul to believe that the Carvalet contract had been successfully negotiated. Then, to save the workmen's jobs, I put in a secret call to Paris and, speaking as De Gué, told Carvalet we were now willing to meet their demands.

Someone was listening on the extension. . . .

III Discovery of the extension, and of the eavesdropper, must wait. I felt it more immediately important to find out something about Jean de Gué's personal finances. The checkbook in the dressing room upstairs, which I went to fetch, bore cryptic figures and initials but no balance, and its only worthwhile information was the name of the bank and the branch address in a neighboring town.

There was no desk in the dressing room. Somewhere in the château there must be a room where the owner wrote his letters and kept personal possessions. I remembered the library where the family had assembled for lunch. I went down again to the hall, and through the dining room to the library, now closed. Entering, I saw what I was looking for—a desk in the corner. It was locked. The bunch of keys—part of Jean de Gué's personal belongings, along with his change, his wallet, his checkbook and his driving license—had been with me ever since I had first started to wear his clothes. I tried them now, and one of them fitted.

The opened desk revealed letters, bills, receipts thrown in haphazard. The drawers, when I tried them, were no better. One half inch open and they jammed, choked with books and documents, papers and photographs. I wanted bank statements and I could not find them, only the stubs of the checkbooks long since used and put away. Finally, a red leather cover, which might be a ledger, catching my eye, I tugged it out, only to reveal a game book, with list upon list of pheasants, partridges, hares shot long before the war. The gap it left gave space for my wandering hands, and, roaming past a revolver, they found an album full of photographs, most of them faded, stuck tightly into old-fashioned slots.

I let the bank statements go. A glimpse at the past was irresistible. The album bore a crest on the first page, a hound's head and a tree, and underneath was written "Marie de Gué." When I turned the page, there was the mother, unmistakably, a young woman in her mid-twenties, the shock of gray hair blond, set in waves by tongs, a frilly blouse adorning the sloping shoulders. Beside it was the date, 1914. Then followed, one by one, the others: Jean de Gué, the father, suggesting Paul but with a bristling mustache; the two of them together, gazing down with fond parental pride at what must have been a much-cosseted and much-beribboned Blanche; then friends and relatives, an Uncle This, an Aunt That, an aged grandpère. The dates were not always given, and often I had to guess what summer it was when a small boy and a girl straddled a pony, or what winter the same pair posed in mufflers, their arms round each other's necks. This couple were seldom separate. With a little shock of surprise—even, oddly, of distaste—I saw that this second figure, Blanche, was as a child almost a replica of the Marie-Noël of today. It was only in the photographs taken later, when she must have been about fifteen, that she began to change, the oval face lengthening, the expression in the eyes becoming more solemn. Even so, I could not recognize in that grave and surely sympathetic face the tight-lipped spinster of today.

The young Jean was never solemn. Every snapshot showed laughter, or a comic attitude. Paul did not figure much in the album. He was often out of focus, the dimmest figure in a group. Even the clearest photograph of all three children showed him half obscured by Jean's shoulder. I recognized figures here and there in groups: the curé, slimmer, younger, yet cherubic then; and, flicking back the pages to the baby days, there was surely Julie of the verrerie, nursing Paul. There was one young man called Maurice who appeared often in the latter pages of the album. He was among groups at the glass foundry, and at the château, and there was one of him and Jean together. Then, abruptly, the snapshots ended.

The pictures of a past when all seemed well were disturbed by an intrusion from the present. I heard someone fumble with the doors that led into the dining room and, pushing the album back into the desk, I turned and there was Renée.

"I heard the car," she said, "and I thought Paul might be with you. Then I met Charlotte in the passage, and she told me you were alone. I guessed you would be here. Well,

The winter bride or the one who is planning an early-spring wedding has many romantic choices—chiffon, point d'esprit, fragile lace or, as photographed, a great white cloud of embroidered tulle. This dress, slender bodiced, instep length in front and trailing gracefully, is worn with a satin bow and tulle veil. The bouquet is pale pink geraniums with bouvardia . . . or it might be pink and white camellias. The wedding dress by Gaston Mallet of Murray Hamburger, veil by Lilly Dache.

Winter Honeymoon

The bride who marries when the year is new has the most romantic plan of all—a honeymoon in the winter sun, the freshest choice of a wedding dress, the prettiest fashions of the year from which to check off, one by one, the clothes she'll remember the rest of her life. The colors of fashion might have been thought out especially for brides—pale blue, green, mauve, pink—pale enough to be neutral, to go together charmingly and to take many of the same accessories. Chiffon, jersey and linen are the fabrics to love best. The print with a happy future is the casual, the sports dress, the ankle-length dance dress. Cashmere sweaters take on still another new look, cut short and bound with silk or linen.

Bathing suits have decidedly built-up necklines or are strapless and very bare. Black, white and sand tones are beach colors, designed for accessories. A beige flannel suit with a cropped jacket boards a cruise ship now, goes on pleasingly into spring. Hats are draped with printed silk or chiffon, pastel slippers are light as a breeze, bags are tapestry satchels or flat, flat straw purses. BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

THE MERRYMAKERS

By WALTER CLEMONS

During the intermission we washed down gravelly oatmeal cookies with pineapple punch. Somebody figured out what oatmeal cookies are good for and lobbed one at a pal across the dance floor. Back it came spinning through the air. Squeals. War broke out, but the chaperons crushed it. The orchestra lurched into a fox trot, net skirts rustled, chairs scraped, and boys in their first tuxedos, fifty faces blank with doom, rose and launched their partners.

Every month we went to the Merrymakers' Club dances upstairs in the old Junior League building. We were fourteen years old; there was no out. A board of iron mothers ran the club, and a week or so before each dance, if you hadn't asked a date yet, you were apt to come home from school in the afternoon to find a telephone number to call; at the other end of the wire a mother was waiting, with news that some sad tall girl or bouncy pill hadn't been asked yet, and a suggestion. So if you knew what was good for you, you asked a popular girl a month ahead, sent a carnation corsage trimmed with net the color of her dress, and box-stepped under the balloons without reasoning why, until another Merrymakers' evening was done. A thick gruel, stirred slowly clockwise to music by the mothers, was our merrymaking.

Someone tapped me on the shoulder. I said politely, "Thank you, Kitty," and smiled down into a grotto of tiny white teeth. Impartial as a lighthouse, she turned her smile to the partner who replaced me, and I started to the edge of the dance floor. You had to be careful, for if you so much as brushed against one of the toiling couples they would split like a dry pod, the boy would make for the punch table without a blush of shame or a backward look, and you would find yourself dancing. I tiptoed respectfully around Hallie Beth Bosley as if she were a bomb and made it to the wall where Edwina Moore had been standing since the music began, thin and unhappy, with a worthless dance card dangling from her wrist.

I said, "Would you care to dance, Edwina?"

"Oh, yes, thank you." She cast a farewell look around the room. "I was supposed to have this dance with Jack, but he chickened out." Then she gave it up and put her cool hand in mine and I led her out on the floor. Edwina didn't dance cheek to cheek like the popular girls and that made things awkward because we kept looking each other in the eye and having to make conversation.

I said, "It's an awfully good dance, isn't it, Edwina?"

"Yes, it is," Edwina said hopelessly. "The orchestra's good, isn't it?"

"Yes, it is," I said. We danced on, uttering little pale sentences like these. I asked whom she'd come with and was sorry I'd brought it up. Her cousin. A put-up job, obviously.

"Jo Anne looks pretty tonight," Edwina said.

Not knowing whether to say, "Thank you," or "Yes, she does," or to attempt a flight of fancy like "Not as pretty as you," I kept my mouth shut. Jo Anne was the girl I'd brought to the dance and whose silver identification bracelet I wore on my left wrist.

I was in my usual condition of misery at these dances. I CONTINUED ON PAGE 108

FOOLPROOF COLOR SCHEMES

Two basic, vivid plans set against white backgrounds—for any room, in any style.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND, Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

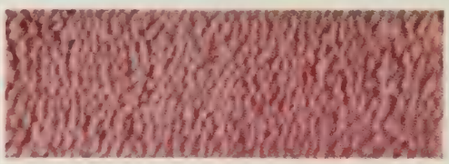
The color fan shows the inexpensive, sturdy materials used in the photograph below. Predominant colors are taken from David Porter's flower painting.

✻ Color can be the magic key in making your rooms charming. In a new series, the JOURNAL is going to suggest color schemes which are "foolproof," so sure-fire that they apply to rooms small or large, old or new, contemporary or traditional. We will show swatches of actual materials which are widely available and inexpensive. The important thing in a color scheme is that it be complete. Don't buy until you have found every material in every color for your scheme—then go ahead with a happy mind.

For a more traditional room, another version of our "warm" color scheme, rosy reds against white. Darker woods and floors will shine and glow among these slightly formal cottons.



Draperies:
Cotton chintz, pinky-red on white.

Love Seat:
Cotton damask in a medallion pattern.

Carpet:
More pale pink in tufted rayon.

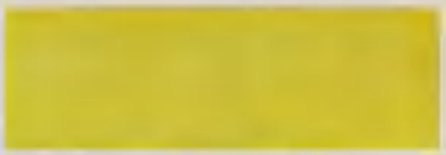
Accents:
Bright green, soft pink corduroy.

White is the amateur decorator's best friend. In the first place, it's the easiest—everything goes with white. And some things go best with white—beautiful woods, clear colors, polished floors. Nowadays white is not the luxury it used to be because of the many washable, easy-to-apply, easy-to-patch, often rolled-on paints. So begin with a "white with" scheme; beautiful either for a redo or as a fresh start. On these pages we show two color plans, one in the red-pink family, one in the greens and blues.

For our "warm" scheme, the living room is contemporary in feeling. The problem of the picture window facing on a street or other public view, we think, has been solved neatly and prettily. Three quarters of the window is covered with a no-iron, over-all printed sheer, a cotton-and-Dacron mixture. These look perfectly charming in rosy tones, give privacy, let in light. Since they are just gathered on a curtain rod, they are simplicity itself to make, easy as pie to launder. A bamboo roll blind lets down to cover the whole window if desired. Of course if your picture window frames a garden, you're in luck. Not only do you have a pretty view, but your choice of window treatment is much wider. Any casement material—inexpensive plain cotton, sheer or otherwise, printed chintz, and so on—can be used in draw draperies or café curtains. For the large piece in the room, the sofa, we have used red denim with accents of gray and brilliant green. If you prefer your red in smaller doses, this could be accent color with the sofa done in gray, also denim. The light floor is bare here, but an area rug could be added in a neutral shade or a soft pink. If you are saving up for a large carpet later on, do not be dismayed, as a highly polished floor is a thing of beauty in itself.

Inspiration here comes from delphinium-print chintz, our setting reflecting its clear colors. Again materials are durable, moderately priced.

HAROLD FOWLER



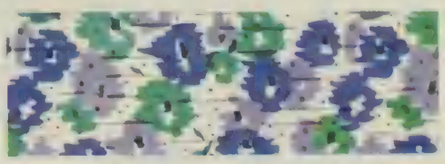
And now for our "cool" color scheme: the beautiful blues, greens, violets crisp and clear on a background of white. Although we have imagined this room in a somewhat older house with smaller windows, darker floors, more traditional furniture, this scheme will apply equally well to a modern interior, if you wish. According to the size of your room and the kind of furniture you have, these ingredients can be used in a variety of ways. A heavenly delphinium print blooms on a white chintz for the floor-length draperies, narrow green-and-white stripe makes the valance. This is also used as covering for a side chair. Our sofa is covered in blue denim, but if your room is fairly big you might like to repeat the flowered chintz on a large piece, sofa, love seat or club chair, using the blue for an accent. Other lovely high lights in this blue-green vista are a slightly bitter yellow, a dash of violet. If you are a stripe fan, use the green and white for draperies, the flower print for sofa and chair, the blue, violet and yellow again as accents. Use more white if you like. White sailcloth draperies with valances of the chintz will look very handsome indeed, make your living room seem larger, airier. If you do this, be sure to use the delphinium print in quantity—on two big chairs or on sofa and chair. In this case, either the blue or the violet would be your secondary color for smaller pieces, such as side chair or ottoman. Stripes and yellow would be for accents.

Again we say, show off your floors or show off a good carpet. A carpet that is beautiful and long-lasting is worth waiting for. With this cool scheme, use sparingly a vibrant green, here all wool.

For a contemporary living room, our alternate version of the blue-green scheme. This for the house with the big window, light woods, modern prints. Two fabrics are shown for window treatment: white no-iron cotton to obscure the window, let in light; striped cotton for draw draperies, either over the white ones or by themselves.

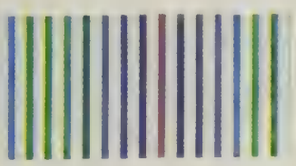
Accent:

Yellow cotton in small but brilliant quantities.



Sofa:

Sturdy blue corduroy tailors, washes well.



Accent:

Posy print for many throw pillows.

Windows:

White cotton georgette for curtains, striped cotton for draperies.

Carpet:

Tufted rayon in a pale shade of aqua.

WORKING WITH CHURCHILL, TALKS WITH GANDHI AND LADY ASTOR'S PARTIES

By LORD Halifax

Viscount Halifax, who was the British ambassador to the United States during World War II, has had one of the most distinguished and colorful careers on the contemporary international scene. After fifteen years as a Conservative Member of Parliament, he was appointed Viceroy of India in 1925. He succeeded Anthony Eden as Foreign Secretary in 1928 and held the same post in the Chamberlain and Churchill cabinets. This is the second of four installments of excerpts from his book, Fullness of Days, to be published soon by Messrs. Collins.

In the autumn of 1908 Dougie Malcolm introduced me to Dorothy Onslow in the refreshment room at Berwick-on-Tweed station, where we all met changing trains on our way to stay for a ball at Kelso, she with Lady Nina Balfour at Newton, Don and I with the Homes at The Hirsel. I remember we all had tea together, but I saw little more of Dorothy till the following summer, as she went off to spend some weeks on a visit to the Greys in Canada.

We saw each other a good deal after she got back, in London and at weekends in the country, meeting more than once at Bisham on the river where Nina Balfour dispensed open-handed hospitality to large parties over the weekend. She organized these with much care and did not at all like any plans for the distribution and occupation of her guests being upset. A standard of discipline and good behavior was imposed on them, which they might ignore only at the peril of their names' being removed from a legendary Pink Book, in which lists of approved guests were said to be preserved. All this was partly fun, but also partly serious, and could very quickly become more serious if the wrong kind of liberty were taken. For to her, persons and things were more often black and white than gray, and both likes and dislikes were vigorous. But Dorothy and I were fortunately able to hold our place among the favored ones, and both then and till she died Nina was always a perfect friend to us both.

In July, 1909, we became engaged and in September were married. Dorothy's father, Lord Onslow, had been governor general of New Zealand, served in several Conservative governments, and at the time of our engagement was Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords. He was a most sympathetic and delightful father-in-law, full of vitality and interest in everything.

Particularly was he interested in my parliamentary career, on which he gave me much good advice. One point on which he dwelt with much insistence was the necessity of any young member who had to make his way choosing a subject. Of this he would make himself master; on it he would speak with acknowledged authority whenever it came up; and so would succeed in establishing for himself a generally accepted position in the national counsels. But it was no good for a beginner to fly too high; foreign policy and large fields of that order were likely to smother rather than speed the career. So it was thought well for me to specialize—I can remember the subject now—in the detailed figures of the several items that made up the cost of running motor buses. Thus I should be able to put my finger, and the finger of Parliament, on the cost of fares, and correct anything that might be wrong. But I am afraid I did not adhere to this line very long, and Lord Onslow was very tolerant of my defection. His death while still in his fifties was a great loss and sadness to us all.

We had a brief honeymoon, as we were almost immediately plunged into all the activities of nursing the constituency at Ripon. I must confess that electioneering and constituency work were always for me an effort and, in spite of many valuable friendships to which they were the introduction, somewhat irksome. Doing the work with a wife was much better than doing it alone; though even on that almost axiomatic proposition there were two opinions. The late Lord Mancroft, when he sat in the House of Commons, asked me whether I generally took my wife with me to women's meetings in my constituency. I told him that I did, unless she was tied up with anything else. "Oh, you make a great mistake. If a man goes alone to a women's meeting, at once the natural protective instinct of the sex CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

Pretty flower Arrangements that last and last...

By CORINNA CUNLIFFE

There are so many lovely fake flowers available these days which can be used to brighten up a room or pick up colors in a table setting when real flowers are hard to come by and expensive. All these arrangements were made from flowers bought at the five-and-ten, or from various dried leaves and seed pods which can be found in most parts of the country. Don't worry about trying to make the flowers look real—they never will—but concentrate on using the colors to the best advantage in whatever room you decide to use them. . . . A mass of different pinks, blues or yellows can be piled in a low dish as shown in the picture of the centerpiece, or you can let your whimsey take over and make a perpetually flowering tree to sit on a side table. Be careful only that the arrangements are not too stiff, as false flowers are more severe in themselves than real ones are.

Filled with pale buds and small false flowers, this swan sails across a low coffee table, or makes a spot of brightness on a lamp table.

Colorful paper butterflies brighten up this mixture of dry leaves, tiger fern, honesty pods and strawflowers.

This little tree blossoms the whole year round. Small bunches of flowers from the dime store are wired to a well-shaped branch which is stuck in a pretty jardiniere.

Here a few fake flowers are used to brighten up foxtails, bulrushes and ferns. This arrangement is pretty when used with china ornaments or between two attractive plates.

Imitation carnations massed in a colorful pyramid arrangement over a support of crumpled chicken wire.

MARDI GRAS

Fabulous fare of the deep South—from jambalaya to a glamorous fruit ice.

We greet you in January, in that Janus month of new beginnings when there is so much to say to good friends—and what can say it more eloquently than a feast? Your table is spread with delicious dishes to welcome the brand-new year, there is a bowl of warm spicy punch, a roaring fire, and a crowd of friends are remembering old songs.

"New Orleans food," you murmur lovingly (there is no other way) and a jambalaya appears, steaming in an old flowered Haviland tureen—a treasure-lode of ham bits and spicy sausage, hiding in a bed of pink-and-brown rice. Then there is a cold daube glacé—which is pot roast, simmered in its juices till lusciously tender, and shimmering in its own rich brown aspic. The Creole stuffed eggplant is almost indescribably delicious, with a golden filling of buttery crumbs, shrimp and seasonings, and garnished with the big gleaming pink shrimp, so famous in New Orleans. There's a classic green salad, but with a little sliced green onion nesting in the lettuce, and the faintest powdering of nutmeg, a special Louisiana touch. Could you ask for anything more? Of course not, but you'll find that there are relishes on the table, and a big heavenly frozen dessert, the tradition and pride of the Mardi Gras season.

Five Superlative Casseroles from the Journal Kitchen

There's everything to be said for casseroles—but most of all, they're just so good to eat! Break through the golden-brown crust—could be buttery, herby bread crumbs, or croutons toasted, and golden with cheese—and find chicken bubbling in creamy mushroom sauce; veal curried, crunchy and sweet with Brazil nuts; all those bits of leftover vegetables irresistible in the unexpected company of tuna and sour cream!

Take this matter of curries. A curry, exotic and delicious with spice, stirs the imagination as well as the palate. And the crisp Brazil nuts make this one uncommonly good. Try it on a ravenous skating crowd!

Veal Curry with Brazil Nuts

Dredge 3 pounds stewing veal, cut into 2" cubes, in seasoned flour. Then sauté in 2 tablespoons butter till golden on all sides. Add a cup of chopped onion (if you come out with a little more onion than this, go right ahead and put it in) and cook till the onion is tender, and golden as the meat. Remove the meat and onions to a casserole, and add to your skillet a can of condensed mushroom soup and 1¼ cups milk, and mix together, heating so that it will blend nicely. Then add two tablespoons curry powder, a dash of pepper, and a pinch each of thyme and marjoram. Chop and toast a full cup Brazil nuts, add them to the sauce and pour it over the meat and onions, so patient in the casserole. Bake until the veal is tender, about 45 minutes, in a moderate—350° F.—oven. Serves 4.

RED GERANIUMS

Life did not bring me silken gowns,

But I can glimpse, beyond my pane, a green and friendly hill,
And red geraniums aflame upon my window sill.

Tender, plump meat balls, deliciously seasoned, hide in a bed of green noodles and savory tomato sauce. Have grated Parmesan to sprinkle on each serving, and a green salad, glorified with golden circles of egg.

Now for the casserole that makes leftover vegetables enticing—how welcome can a casserole be? This one is exceptionally co-operative. We used Brussels sprouts, peas, corn and other good things; but if a glimpse into the refrigerator shows you string beans, chopped broccoli or cauliflower, just relax and use what you've got, following our quantities.

Vegetable Roundup

Mix together in a shallow heatproof baking dish a cup of cooked frozen Brussels sprouts, ⅔ cup cooked frozen peas, ⅔ cup whole-kernel corn, one 7-ounce can tuna, 1 cup thick commercial sour cream, ½ teaspoon salt, a good pinch or grind of pepper, a pinch of dried dill. Sauté a tablespoon finely chopped onion and one 3-ounce can sliced mushrooms, drained, in 1 tablespoon butter, and add to the other ingredients. Top the casserole with ½ cup bread crumbs tossed in 1 tablespoon melted butter or margarine. Bake for 20 minutes in a moderately slow oven—325° F. Brown under the broiler for 5 minutes before serving to give the crumbs a pretty burnishing. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Chicken in a sauce smooth as velvet—cream, mushrooms, onion to strengthen its character, the unexpected fillip of tarragon vinegar—it all tells the story of this thoughtfully seasoned, rich and delicious

Smothered Chicken

Marinate for 3 to 4 hours 2 chickens, cut into pieces for frying, in a cup tarragon vinegar and ½ cup lemon juice. Then dip in 2 eggs beaten with 2 tablespoons water. Roll in 2 cups crushed corn flakes or cracker crumbs. Sauté in ½ cup butter. Pour 2 tablespoons tarragon vinegar into a shallow casserole. Add the browned chicken, 1 quart sliced mushrooms and about ½ cup chopped onion that has been sautéed until tender. Cover with 1 can condensed mushroom soup mixed with an equal quantity of light cream. Bake in a moderate oven—350° F.—for 45 minutes to 1 hour. Serves 6.

Meat-Balls and Green Noodles Casserole

To make the meat balls: Mix together ½ pound ground beef, ¼ pound ground veal and ¼ pound ground pork. Add 1½ cups soft bread crumbs to ½ cup tomato sauce. Sauté 1 medium-sized onion, chopped, in 1½ tablespoons butter until golden brown. Then add with the bread crumbs to the meat. Also measure and add 1½ teaspoons salt and a pinch of black pepper. Mix this well and shape into about 24 or so small meat balls. Melt 3 tablespoons butter in a large skillet and sauté the meat balls in it until browned on all sides.

To make the sauce: Measure the butter in skillet and add enough more to make ¼ cup. Add ¼ cup flour and blend smoothly so that there are no lumps. Add two 10½-ounce cans bouillon and a cup of milk. Cook, stirring vigorously, until thickened. Then add ½ cup grated Parmesan cheese, 2 teaspoons tomato paste, 1 clove garlic, crushed, and salt to your fancy.

(Dare we say 'meanwhile'?), cook a 5-ounce bag green noodles according to the package directions. Layer the casserole first with the noodles, then with the meat balls. End with a layer of noodles and pour your sauce over all. Heat in a moderate oven—350° F.—for about 20 minutes or until bubbly. Serve with grated Parmesan cheese. Serves 4 to 6.

Tamale Casserole

Sauté until tender 2 cups sliced onion in a large skillet in 3 tablespoons bacon fat. Add ¾ cup or so of chopped green pepper, a 6-ounce can sliced mushrooms and 1 pound ground beef. Sauté until meat is browned. Blend 2 tablespoons flour with the meat mixture. Season with 4 teaspoons chili powder (5, if you feel venturesome), 2 teaspoons salt and 1 teaspoon sugar. Mix well with one 12-ounce can whole-kernel corn and 1 No. 2 can tomatoes. Bake in a shallow baking dish as near to 12" x 7½" x 1½" as you can manage, in a moderate oven—350° F.—for 30 minutes. Meanwhile, prepare 1 package corn-muffin mix according to the directions on the package. Spoon the muffin mix over the tamale casserole. Bake in a hot oven—400° F.—for 20 to 25 minutes or until corn-muffin topping is browned and baked through. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

It is fun to vary the routine a bit, on casserole toppings. Start by mixing an herb medley into those bread crumbs after you've ground a batch. And stir curry powder into melted butter and toss with crushed cracker crumbs when they're destined to deck a creamed-spinach and egg affair.

When sea food comes bubbling from the oven, interlace the thinnest green and red pepper rings over the top. Drift sesame seeds over crab meat au gratin before heating in individual baking shells.

Crusty French-fried onion rings, canned or frozen, make a most savory blanket for lamb or beef-and-potato hash. Arrange rings over the meat before sliding into the oven so they'll heat together. And turn hash into something supreme by crowning it before baking with Cheddar-cheese-filled mushroom caps on thick tomato slices!

That young and active gentlemen
Are most fond of me!
Their mothers shouldn't mind it —
What bananas do
Is give energy to youngsters . . .
And the same to you!
Any time you need a pickup
A banana's what to try — aye!
Sliced with milk you cannot beat 'em
Or you can simply peel and eat 'em.
For vitamins and minerals and nourishment
Bananas are just dandy
So keep bananas in your fruit bowl
And keep your fruit bowl handy!

en't you going to apologize for your be-vior at lunch?"

The wretched mishandling of the gifts was be thrown up at me again. "I've already ologized to Paul," I said. "Won't that do?"

Pent-up emotion showed in the tense body, e nervous hands. "Why did you do it?" she
d. "Isn't it difficult enough without making em suspicious, and above all hurting Paul? were you deliberately setting out to make a ol of me as well?"

"Listen," I said. "I had so much to drink in Mans that I couldn't remember what I had t in those packages. For all I knew, I had ought everybody books."

"You expect me to believe that?" she asked.
here was no mistake in what you gave ançoise, was there?"

Here, surely, was the worst sort of feminine te, the grudge of a gift from husband to
e. I was glad that Françoise had the locket h the miniature, and not Renée.

"I gave Françoise something I knew she uld value," I said. "If you are disappointed your own present, it's too bad. Give it to rmaine. I don't mind in the least what you with it."

f I had hit her I could not have moved her re. She stared at me, color flooding her e, and came slowly across the room to the k. Before I realized what she was about, had her arms round me, her face against ne.

"What is it?" she said. "Why are you so nged? Are you afraid to make love to io that was it. Perhaps I should have ssed, but her words came as a shock and d me with dismay. I did not want to kiss
?"

. The clinging arms repelled and the seek-mouth froze response.

"Renée," I said, "someone may come —weak, futile excuse of every cowardly er—and I backed ungallantly from this un-ected and embarrassing proximity. But she owed me, her hands striving to caress, to g, and I thought how lacking in grace and nity is the male under assault. A woman, if is attacked by a bully, has at least feminine lty to lend charm.

"We have to be careful," I said, "and not our heads. I think Paul understands ut that piece of nonsense I gave you. I le very light of it, and I can do the same to nçoise. But we mustn't go on meeting in way. The servants might see us, and once picion got into their minds there would be nd to every sort of complication."

s I listened to my own voice I realized
I was actually committing myself more ply. I was taking intrigue for granted, and ng slip in the most cowardly fashion blessed opportunity to say frankly and tally, "I don't love you and I don't want
. That's final."

"You mean," said Renée, "that we must t somewhere else? But how? Where are o go?"

o tears from her. No touching demand for ction. What Jean de Gué had doubtless ted as a pastime had turned to a liability.

"I'll think of something," I said. "But renber what I say—we must be careful."

an de Gué himself could not have spoken greater duplicity. How easy it was, after to be a cad. To my relief, I heard the d's voice in the room beyond. Renée, with xasperated shrug, moved from my side.

"Papa? Where are you?"

"In here. Do you want me?"

he burst into the room. Instinctively I ned my arms, wondering, as she sprang them monkey-fashion, whether I could her from now on as a buffer against the ands of an adult world.

"Gran'mie is awake," she said. "She wants oth to go to her room for tea. I have been ng her about the presents. And do you w, papa, you made a mistake with the one my Aunt Blanche? She would not open it, maman and I unwrapped it for her, and inwas a note, 'For my beautiful Béla, from
.' It was an enormous bottle of scent called 'Femme,' in a lovely box, and the price upon it still, ten thousand francs."

As we went upstairs together Marie-Noël said, "It's a funny thing, but everybody seems to be in a bad mood about those presents. Maman was so pleased with hers this morning, and then after lunch she took it off and put it with the rest of the things in her jewel case. Who is Béla, papa?"

I was thankful I did not know. "Someone," I said, "who likes expensive scent."

"Does maman know her?"

"I doubt it."

"I doubt it too. When I asked her she crumpled up the note and said it must have been some business friend in Paris who had asked you to dinner, and the scent was a return of politeness."

"Possibly," I said.

"The trouble is, you know, your memory's getting worse. Fancy making such a muddle and giving it to Aunt Blanche instead. Why, you haven't given her anything as long as I can remember. I've never quite understood why—grown-up people behave in the strangest way. But even I can see there is not much point in giving Aunt Blanche a present when she hasn't spoken to you for fifteen years."

Fifteen years. . . . This sudden piece of information made me pause halfway up the stairs to stare at the child, forgetting my role. No wonder the giving of a present had been out of character. The revelation was disturbing, especially when I remembered the snapshots of the two children with their arms about each other. Something personal and bitter had come between Blanche and Jean de Gué.

"Here we are," said Marie-Noël, throwing open the door, and once again, as on the evening before, a wave of heat engulfed me from the stove. The small terriers were back again. They leaped from the bed, barking shrilly.

"Charlotte," said the comtesse, "did you take Jo-Jo and Fifi for their walk or were you gossiping below all afternoon?"

"Naturally I took them, Madame la Comtesse," said Charlotte, at once pricked to self-defense. "They came with me up and down the park for nearly an hour."

"Go on, get out," commanded the comtesse angrily. "The child will look after us." Staring up at me from her bunch of bolster and pillow, the face still gray and flabby, deep shadows beneath her eyes, she put out her hand and pulled me down beside her. As I kissed the sagging cheek I thought how odd it was that this filial embrace was somehow comforting, while the brush with the handsome Renée had been distasteful, crude.

"Mon Dieu," she whispered, "how the little one made me laugh!" Then, pushing me away, she said aloud, "Sit down and drink your tea. What have you been doing all day besides getting your parcels mixed up?"

Once again I was at ease with her; I could talk, I could laugh. I told of my visit to the verrerie, and the comtesse enlarged upon past glories as old people will, to my secret interest and the child's delight. She told us of the days when the glass was blown by hand, and how a century ago there had been a hundred and sixty horses working, and women and children. The names of the workmen were all written down in a book, in the library.

"Oh, well," she said, "that's all over. The old days can never come back."

I was reminded of Julie, who had shown the same acceptance of change. I told her about my visit to the cottage, and the poor burned André lying in bed.

She shrugged her shoulders, grown suddenly callous. "Oh, those people," she said. "They'll squeeze the last franc out of us if they can. I wonder how much Julie has got out of me in her time. As for her son, he's always been a good-for-nothing."

"That cottage is in a shocking state of repair," I said.

"Don't do anything about it," she answered. "Once you begin, they'll ask for something else. We're beggared enough without bothering about them. And likely to remain so, unless Françoise produces a son, or ——" She stopped, and although I did not understand her words, a certain tone in her voice, and the sidelong glance she gave me, were somehow acutely disconcerting. After a moment she went on, "These days people must fend for themselves. And what are they grumbling at? They have no rent to pay."

"Julie didn't grumble," I said.

"I should hope not. She's got a nice sum, no doubt, tucked away under a floor board. I wish I had as much."

Her attitude troubled me. I felt disenchanted. Julie, who had seemed so honest and so loyal, was now shown as grasping, and the comtesse, a moment ago laughing and generous, was suddenly heartless.

"You know," said Marie-Noël, breaking into the conversation, "it was very curious when maman and I opened that present in front of my Aunt Blanche. Maman said, 'Don't be so obstinate, Blanche. If Jean has brought you something it must mean he has some feeling, surely, and wants to tell you so in this way.' And my Aunt Blanche looked down and said, 'You open it, then. I don't mind—it's nothing to me,' but I am sure she was curious too. So we opened the parcel, and when maman saw the big bottle of scent she said, 'Good heavens, whyever this?' and my Aunt Blanche had to look then, and do you know she went dead white, and she got straight up and went out of the room. Maman said, in a funny sort of way, 'I'm afraid it must have been a joke after all, and rather cruel.' Then of course we found the note to the other person, Béla, and maman said, 'No, it isn't a joke, it's a mistake.' But I still don't see why either of them should have thought it cruel."

Her words seemed to make a hole in silence. The mother stared at me, and there was something in her eyes I could not read.

"You know, little one," she said, "the ways of women are very mysterious, especially one who is religious like your aunt. Remember that, and don't turn into a fanatic like her." She looked suddenly tired and old.

"Come on," I said to Marie-Noël. "Let's put the tea table out of the way."

We moved it back against the wall, beside the dressing table, on which I caught a glimpse of a large tinted photograph of Jean de Gué in uniform. Some intuition made me glance at the bed. The mother was gazing at it, too, the same odd look of speculation on her face. At that moment Charlotte came into the room, followed by the curé. The child went to him and curtsied.

"Bon soir, Monsieur le Curé," she said. "Papa has given me a life of the Little Flower. Shall I fetch it for you to see?"

The old man patted her head. "Later, my child, later." He advanced to the foot of the bed and stood looking down at the gray, exhausted face of the comtesse.

"Well," he said, "so we are not so bright today? Too much excitement yesterday, perhaps, followed by a wakeful night and bad dreams. St. Augustine has something to say about that. He suffered too."

He drew a book from the folds of his cassock, and I saw the comtesse force her wandering attention to his words. She motioned to the chair I had just left, and the curé, spreading his skirts, sat down.

"May I stay?" whispered Marie-Noël. When I nodded, she fetched the stool from the dressing table and planted it close to the curé.

I left the room and went downstairs and out into the park. The château, which had seemed a jewel in sunlight, was more forbidding at the approach of dusk. The roof and turrets that had blended against blue took on a sharpened tone against the changing sky. Someone was going round closing the shutters and folding the long windows one by one, and the shutting out of night was like withdrawal into privacy.

This second evening of my masquerade took shape and substance like a second night at school. I was familiar now with my surroundings. I recognized sounds, smells, voices, washed my hands and changed my coat and shoes for dinner with the same herd instinct as a new boy who does as the others do.

Dinner was a silent affair. We were only four. Marie-Noël, I discovered, had soup and biscuits at seven and did not join us, while Blanche, according to Gaston, wished to fast. She was in her room, he said, and would not be coming down again this evening.

Conversation languished. Françoise looked tired, and with flagging interest touched upon little topics to stir the silence: the German measles in the village, the curé's evening visit, a letter from a cousin in Orléans. Her voice, when the complaint was out of it, was clear and pleasant. Renée, wearing a high-necked blouse that became her well, had put a spot of rouge on either cheekbone, whether to dazzle me with her charm, or wound me with her wit, or make me jealous with sudden bright chat to Paul I did not know. The scheme, if scheme there was, failed. I was unmoved, and Paul did not notice what she was about. He concentrated upon his food and directly din-

New Jergens Deep Cleanser brings a new down-deep-in-the-skin clean feeling

This is a wonderful new kind of feeling. It could come only from a wonderful new kind of cleanser. Not from any soap . . . too drying. Not from any cream . . . too thick and slow and greasy. Not likely even from other liquid cleansers.

Proof? New Jergens Deep Cleanser was preferred 2 to 1 in a recent hidden-name test among hundreds of women.

The fact is that this new Deep Cleanser, by the makers of Jergens Lotion, has up to 4 times as many cleansing ingredients as traditional cleansing creams . . . to help it search deeper for clogging dirt and make-up . . . to help you tissue them away more quickly, more gently, more thoroughly.

And because every single cleansing ingredient in Jergens Deep Cleanser is also a recognized skin softener, it leaves your face softer, smoother, clearer. Agree . . . or double your money back. Just 39c and 69c plus tax.

ner was over moved to a chair under the best light in the salon and was hidden to view by the wide-open sheets of Figaro.

Marie-Noël came down in a dressing gown, and she, Françoise and I played draughts and dominoes, a peaceful family trio, until nine o'clock struck and Françoise, yawning, said, "Well now, bedtime, chérie."

The child, without demur, got up, tidied away the draughts and put them in a drawer, kissed her uncle and her aunt and her mother, and taking my hand said, "Come on, papa."

This, I supposed, was the nightly routine, and we marched upstairs to the nursery-bedroom in the turret.

"Sit down," the child commanded, and then, taking off her dressing gown, hesitated a moment before going to her makeshift prie-dieu to say her prayers.

"Would you like to watch me mortify the flesh?" she said.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"I sinned, you know, in saying I would kill myself last night," she said. "I told my Aunt Blanche, who said it was very wrong. It's too soon to make my confession, so I've decided to give myself a penance to fit the crime." She slipped off her nightgown, and stood thin and bony before me. "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak," she said. She went to the bookcase and fetched out a small leather dog whip with a knotted end. She shut her eyes and before I realized what she was about lashed herself across her back and shoulders. There was no feint about it. She jumped involuntarily, drawing in her breath with pain.

"Stop it," I said, and, getting up, tore the whip out of her hand.

I picked up the nightgown she had thrown on the floor. "Put it on," I said curtly. "And then say your prayers and get into bed."

She obeyed. The prayers at the packing-case prie-dieu were interminable. She did not say them aloud, so I could not tell if this was pretense or not, but presently she crossed herself, and rose, and with a subdued expression climbed into her narrow bed.

"Good night," I said, and bent to kiss her, but whether the cool, tight face upturned to me was intended as further punishment for herself or for me it was impossible to tell. I went out and shut the door, and glancing down at the worn, knotted whip turned left at the bottom of the turret stairs, and went on sudden impulse to the room at the far end of the first corridor. I tried the handle. It was locked. I knocked on the door.

"Who is there?" said Blanche.

I did not answer. When I knocked again I heard footsteps, and the sound of a key being turned in the lock, and then the door opened and Blanche stood there in a dressing gown. I thrust the whip into her hands.

"Keep this," I said, "or throw it away. Marie-Noël was trying to use it on herself. I suggest you tell her that scourging drives the devil in, not out."

The expression in her eyes turned to hatred so intense that I stared, fascinated, almost hypnotized, by the sudden savagery in that pale, impassive face. Then, before I could say anything more, she had flung herself against the door and locked it, leaving me in the corridor outside.

I walked slowly back along the corridor. As I came to the head of the stairs, wondering what was the procedure now, I met the three of them coming up the stairs to bed: Françoise heavy, leaden-eyed and pale; Renée, the spot of color on her cheek still vivid; and Paul, his hand on the light switch, yawning.

We bade one another good night, pairing off like couples at a set of lancers. I followed Françoise and found that an alteration had taken place in the dressing room. There was now a bed in the room, a camp bed. Oddly, my first instinct was not relief but guilt. What had happened? What was the matter? Then, going to the chest of drawers, I saw standing on it the huge bottle of scent, with the glaring motif "Femme." It was untouched.

I thought a moment, and then passed through the bathroom to the bedroom. Françoise was sitting by her dressing table, pinning her hair.

"Do you want me to sleep in the dressing room?" I asked.

"Wouldn't you prefer it?" she said.

"I don't mind one way or the other," I answered.

"That's what I thought."

She went on pinning her hair. This, I thought, is one of those issues in married life making for reconciliation or tears or interminable argument. We had both of us bungled, her husband and myself, and because I believed he would have responded with silence, that was the course I chose too.

"Very well," I said, "I'll sleep in the dressing room."

I went back into the bathroom and began to run the water. When Françoise brushed past me to fetch a pot of cream, neither of us talking, she might have been some dormitory companion of a bygone era from whom I was temporarily estranged. I felt it neither incongruous nor strange to be in my underwear while she was in a trailing wrapper. I had become part of the bathroom background, and so had she. When, in pajamas and dressing gown, I went to say good night and found her reading, she turned to me a pale, indifferent cheek, with none of last night's anguish and none of last night's tears. I felt again not so much relief as guilt—guilt that the sins of Jean de Gué had been increased by his scapegoat.

I went back to the dressing room and opened the window. As I climbed into the camp bed and lit a cigarette with the thought that this was my second night under the château roof and that forty-eight hours or more had passed since I came to St. Gilles, I knew that everything I had said or done had implicated me further, bound me more closely to that man whose body was not my body, whose mind was not my mind, whose thoughts and actions were a world apart, and yet whose inner substance was part of my nature, part of my secret self.

When I awoke the next morning I knew there was something I had to do. Something urgent. Then I remembered the telephone conversation with Carvalet, and how I had committed myself, or rather the verrerie of St. Gilles, to continued production without the remotest knowledge of the family resources. All I possessed was Jean de Gué's checkbook and the name and address of his bank in Villars. Somehow I had to get to the bank and talk to the manager. He would surely give me a rough idea of the financial situation.

I got up and bathed and dressed while Françoise was still breakfasting in her room. When Gaston came into the dressing room to brush my clothes I told him I was going into Villars, to the bank, and I wanted the car.

"At what time," asked Gaston, "does Monsieur le Comte wish to go into Villars?"

"Any time," I said. "Ten, half past."

"Then I will have the Renault outside at ten o'clock," he said. "Monsieur Paul can take the Citroën to the verrerie."

I had forgotten there was a second car. This would simplify matters.

Gaston must have passed round word of my intention, for I was putting change into my pockets, and was about to go downstairs when the little femme de chambre knocked at the door.

"Excuse me, Monsieur le Comte," she said, "but Madame Paul asked if she may go with you into Villars. She has an appointment with the coiffeur."

I wished Mme. Paul another attack of migraine. The last thing I wanted was another tête-à-tête with her. "Does Madame Paul know I'm leaving at ten o'clock?" I said.

"Yes, monsieur. She has fixed her appointment for half past."

I wondered if it was a deliberate scheme for my company. I told Germaine that of course I would take Mme. Paul to the coiffeur, and then, with a sudden inspiration, passed through the bathroom to the bedroom, where I found Françoise sitting up in bed.

"I'm going into Villars," I said. "Do you want to come?"

Then I remembered that surely every husband kisses his wife good morning, even if she has been banished from her side the night before, and I went up to the bed, and kissed her, and asked her how she had slept.

"I was restless," she said. "It was as well you that you had the camp bed next door. , I can't come into Villars. I'm expecting ctor Lebrun this morning. Why must you ? I had hoped you would see him."

"I have to go to the bank," I said.

"Gaston could go for you," she said, "if u want some money."

"It isn't that. I've got business to discuss."

"I believe Monsieur Péguy is still away ill," said. "I don't know who is doing his rk. The senior clerk, I suppose. He won't much use."

"It doesn't matter."

"We ought to make up our minds finally, know, whether I should go into Le Mans the baby or have it here."

"What do you want to do?" I asked.

he shrugged her shoulders, apathetic, re- ed. "I want you to make the decisions. I'd to feel the whole nightmare lifted from and that I don't have to worry any more." Surely Doctor Lebrun is the right person ake charge of all this," I said. "Ask his nion when he comes this morning."

ven as I spoke I knew that I was wrong. asn't what she meant. She needed reassur- e, and felt herself to be alone. I wanted, perately, to say, "Look, I'm not your hus- d. ook out!" warned Françoise, but it was te. The flying feet overbalanced and crashed upon the little table near the fireplace, scattering a porcelain cat and dog onto the hearth, smashing them irrevocably. There was a moment's silence. The child picked herself up, scarlet in the face, and looked at her mother.

Françoise sat up in bed gazing at the disaster, stunned.

"My cat and dog," she said, "my favorite pieces. The two my mother gave me that I brought from home."

I thought for a moment that the shock of this sudden accident was too great for her to feel anger, but a tumult of feeling must have swept over her on that instant, breaking all control.

"You little beast," she said to the child. "Why doesn't your father teach you discipline and manners? You wait until you have a brother, then he'll get the petting and you'll take second place, and a good thing it will be for you and for everybody else. Now leave me, both of you. I don't want either of you, leave me alone."

The child, her face drained of color, ran from the room.

I went over to the bed. "Françoise ——-" I began, but she pushed me away.

"No," she said. "No—no—no!" She flung herself back on her pillows, burying herself against them.

I picked up the fragments of the porcelain animals and carried them into the dressing room, so that her eye should not fall upon them when she looked again. Mechanically I wrapped them in the discarded cellophane and paper that had served for the bottle of scent still standing on the table. There was no sign of Marie-Noël, and remembering the night before, and the whip, and—even worse—the threat of the open window, I went out of the dressing room and up the back stairs to the turret room, running three steps at a time. But when I came to the room I saw with relief that the window was closed, and that she was undressing.

"What are you doing?" I asked.

"I've been naughty," she said. "Don't I have to go to bed?"

"I don't think so," I said. "I don't think it would do much good. And anyway, you were not naughty. It was bad luck."

"But I can't come to Villars now, can I?" she asked.

"Why not?"

She looked bewildered. "It's a treat," she said. "A person can't have a treat when they've broken something valuable."

"You didn't intend to break the figures," I said. "The thing to do is to try and have them mended. Perhaps we could find a shop in Villars."

She shook her head in doubt. "I don't think there is one."

"We'll see," I said.

Her eyes searched mine, as though in hungry confirmation of some unspoken thought. "Shall I put on my dress again?" she asked.

"Yes. Then come downstairs. It's nearly ten o'clock."

I went down to the dressing room, and picked up the broken pieces in their wrapping paper. Downstairs the car was waiting, and Renée was standing in the hall.

"I hope I haven't kept you waiting," she said.

There was a world of anticipation in her voice as she walked past me onto the terrace and down the steps. This was to be her day. Then the child came running across the terrace after us. She wore white cotton gloves, and a white plastic handbag dangled from her wrist on a chain.

"I'm coming with you, Aunt Renée," she said.

Alas, we cannot say that the ravages caused by drunkenness are decreasing. It is one of the crying scandals of our time that, in the face of the awful biological peril to our race, nearly all governments show themselves careless and negligent to the point of complicity. Even if it were true that alcohol harms only the individual drunkard, drunkenness remains one of the most terrible and potent causes of human degradation, both physical and moral.

I had never seen expression alter so swiftly from assurance to dismay.

"But who said you could come?" exclaimed Renée. "Why aren't you doing your lessons?"

I caught Gaston's eye, and the understanding that I glimpsed, the appreciation of the situation, was so superb that I wanted to wring his hand.

"It suits Aunt Blanche better when we do lessons in the afternoon," said Marie-Noël, "and papa is glad of my company, aren't you, papa? May I get in front? I shall be sick if I sit in the back."

For a moment I thought Renée was going to return to the château. Then she pulled herself together, and without looking at me climbed in behind.

"We will pretend," I said to Marie-Noël, "that I'm a stranger and don't know the way and that you have to direct me."

"Oh, yes," she said. "What a good idea."

As we drove out of St. Gilles and along the side roads through the shimmering countryside, golden green under the October sky, I thought how easily and happily children lend themselves to fantasy. Soon we were out of the magic of field and farm and forest, and back on the hard, straight route nationale and so to Villars, the child announcing in a singsong chant each turn I had to take.

Behind us our passenger kept silence—except once, when I braked swiftly before a suddenly slowing vehicle in front, and the smothered "Ach!" of shock and exasperation, as the jolt shot her forward, betrayed the mood within.

"We'll drop Aunt Renée at the coiffeur and put the car in the Place de la République afterward," said Marie-Noël. I stopped in front of the small establishment with the waxen lady's head in the window all crimped and curled and opened the door for Renée.

"What time will you be ready?" I asked, but she did not answer; she went straight into the shop with never a backward glance.

"She seemed in a bad mood," said Marie-Noël. "I wonder why."

"Never mind about her," I said. "Go on directing me. Don't forget I'm a stranger here."

The absence of Renée put an end to restraint, and my mood, like the child's, turned festive. We found parking space beside a line of lorries, and heedless of the warnings about fleas and rubéole, plunged into the market in the place beside the church.

Nothing was on a grand scale, as it had been in Le Mans. Here were no beasts, no cattle, but trestle tables crammed together in a small space, spilling over with aprons, jackets, mackintoshes, sabots; and the child and I moved leisurely between them, our eyes caught foolishly by the same objects. We bought some gray-and-white checked slippers for Germaine, and then, distracted by a rival firm which was offering the same thing in a lively green, shamelessly took our custom to them; and hardly were the slippers wrapped and paid for than desire seized us both for yellow bootlaces, both for ourselves and for Gaston, and two sponges on a string, and finally a great hunk of milk-white soap, a mermaid riding a dolphin embossed upon its surface.

We turned in the crowded alley, laden with our wares, and I saw we were being watched with amusement by a blond woman in a bright blue coat, her own arms full of dahlias. She said over the child's head, and as though to the stallkeeper beside her, "It must be true, then, that they are closing down the verrerie at St. Gilles and turning it into a bon marché store." And as she brushed past us she murmured, "Père de famille for a change?"

I looked back at the blue coat swinging down the alley, amused, intrigued. Then, Marie-Noël pulling at me, we were involved in purchases once more. I forgot all about my purpose in coming to Villars until the church boomed half past eleven and I thought, aghast, of the bank closing at twelve.

"Come on, hurry," I said, and we went and spilled our purchases in the car.

"Papa," said the child, "we've never seen about mending the broken porcelain for maman," and, looking at her, I saw anxiety in her face, the happiness gone.

"That's all right," I told her; "we'll do it later."

"But the shops will be shut," she urged.

"That can't be helped," I said. "We'll have to risk it."

"I wonder if they mend porcelain in that place by the porte de ville," she said. "You know, where they have candlesticks."

"I don't know," I said. "I shouldn't think so. Look, will you wait for me here in the car? It will be very dull in the bank."

"I don't mind. I'd rather come."

I was not sure I wanted her sharp ears overhearing all I said.

"Listen," I answered, "I may be some time. It is much better for you to stay here, or go and wait with Aunt Renée."

"Oh, no," she said, "that's much worse than the bank. Oh, papa, couldn't I go to the shop by the porte de ville and see if they would mend the porcelain, and then come and meet you at the bank?"

She stared up at me expectantly, delighted with this solution. I hesitated.

"Where is it?" I said. "I've forgotten."

"Just inside the porte de ville," she said impatiently. "I'll come back past the church and straight to the bank. It's barely four minutes."

"All right," I said. "Here's the parcel. Be careful, now." I put the broken pieces wrapped in cellophane and paper into her hands.

I watched her across the road and then turned left to the bank. I pushed through the doors and asked for Monsieur Péguy.

"I'm sorry, Monsieur le Comte," said the clerk, "Monsieur Péguy is still away. Is there anything I can do for you?"

"I want to know how my account stands."

"Excuse me, Monsieur le Comte," said the clerk. "Do you mean you require the bare balance, or do you want to see a full statement of figures?"

"I want to see everything," I said.

He disappeared and returned with a sheaf of papers in his hand. "Perhaps you would like to take a seat in the office, Monsieur le Comte?" he said, and led the way through to a small room with a glass-fronted door.

He left me alone with the file, and as I turned the papers I realized that I was as lost before these columns of figures as I had been before the bills and statements in the verrerie. I could make nothing of them. Then the clerk returned to find out whether I wanted any more information.

"Is this all?" I asked. "You have no other papers of mine?"

He looked at me inquiringly and said, "No, Monsieur le Comte, unless, of course, there is anything you wish to look at in your safe in the vault."

I had a vision of clinking bags of gold in some massive safe. "Is there time for me to look in it before you close?" I asked.

"Certainly," he replied, and he disappeared again and came back with a bunch of keys. I followed him down a long flight of stairs to the basement. He opened a door with one of the keys, and we were in a vast, low room like a cellar, the walls lined with safes, all numbered. He stopped before No. 17, took another of the keys, put it in the lock, and turned it. He withdrew the key, and looked at me expectantly. "Monsieur le Comte has forgotten to bring his key with him?"

Cursing myself for a fool at not knowing what he expected of me, I felt in my pocket and brought out Jean de Gué's keys. One of them—longer and bigger than the others—

Foot Notes on . . . carpets

If you ever wished for a magic carpet—one to look lovely all its days—your answer may be here. A lived-on rug will respond to these revivals, and a new one will keep its fresh tone and springy texture.

- First step: vacuum or carpet-sweep regularly, keep dust from getting a beachhead.
- From time to time, refresh your rug with powdered rug cleaner—one that contains dry-cleaning solvent. Work powder into pile with stiff brush. When it dries light, vacuum. Treat pale rugs monthly.
- Clean an all-dirty carpet with foam skimmed off a lathered mild synthetic detergent solution. Work suds into pile. Remove suds and soil with a sponge wrung out of clear water. When dirt is embedded, professional cleaning is safest.
- "Shading" comes of carpet tufts pressed in opposing directions. Run sweeper or vacuum in direction of pile. Occasionally reverse rugs to change traffic areas.
- To coax up crushed pile, gently apply steam iron (or a hot iron over a damp cloth) to trodden part. Don't press down. Brush briskly afterward. For curled corners, use same treatment front and back.
- To keep accidents from leaving marks, be ready for on-the-spot action. Sponge toward center.
- Grease or oil stain: Cleaning fluid takes this out best. Use effort—dust and dirt will cling if spot isn't completely removed.
- Spilled milk: Use water with synthetic detergent added. Follow with clear-water rinse.
- Fruit juice: Dilute with water and blot with terry cloth or paper toweling. Then sponge with neutralizing solution—a tablespoon of ammonia or baking soda per quart of water. Rinse with clear water. Blot to dry.
- Nail enamel: Lift bulk of stain with blunt knife. Dilute remaining spot with polish remover (without added oil) or thinner. Mop until no trace remains.
- Washable ink: Repeatedly saturate with cold water, blot with towels. But stain from permanent ink calls for a speedy professional job.

The clerk, murmuring that he would leave other mass of papers, all of them tied with Marriage Settlement of Françoise Bruyère," e clerk returned.

"Your little girl is outside," he said. "She ed me to tell you that everything is arged about the porcelain, and can she go k in the lorry with Madame Yves?"

"What?" I asked impatiently, preoccupied h the papers.

He repeated the message stiffly. "All right, right," I said. "Tell her I'll be along in a ment."

Now I had the tape undone and had opened document. I sat down and began to read.
The father of Françoise, a M. Robert uyère, had evidently been a rich man with e faith in the stability of Jean de Gué. Her wry, which was considerable, was there-age of fifty the trust funds were to be di-of the marriage, or, if she predeceased her band before she reached the age of fifty, ween the husband and any daughters. The nt was that the income from this vast trust ld be used only by the parents on the birth male heir, and, if no male child was born, one could touch a sou of the money until nçoise reached the age of fifty—unless, of rse, she were to die before that age. On the ed to the husband for his own use, but this less than a quarter of the dowry.

"Excuse me, Monsieur le Comte, but will

I brought myself back to reality. For a nent it had been as though I were sitting hat vast bedroom in the tower, hearing n the comtesse's voice: "Beggared . . . and y to remain so, unless Françoise produces ert glance was still a mystery.

"I'm coming," I said. "I didn't realize it so late."

put the documents back in the safe. As I so, a paper fell out which had not been up in tape with the others. I saw that it a letter from a lawyer called Talbert, writ-two or three weeks earlier. Odd words ght my eye—"verrerie," "rentes," "place-ts," "dividendes"—and, sensing that here nt be the clue to the whole financial le, I put it in my pocket.

nce more we went through the ritual of keys, and then I followed him out of the t, up the stairs. I looked about me and said nothing of the sort!" I spoke sharply, ous with myself and with him, and he reed the words that I had used, giving them nse I had never intended.

saw that my own impatience had been to he—I had spoken quickly, thoughtlessly, ting to read the document. "Who was this person? Where did she go?" I asked, responsibility flooding me with a sudden vision of gypsies, kidnapers, little girls murdered in woods.

"I rather think it was one of your own lorries from the verrerie, Monsieur le Comte," said the clerk. "Some of your workpeople had been to the station. The child climbed up in the front seat with the woman."

There was nothing to be done about it.
Marie-Noël would either be delivered safely at the château or butchered in the forest. If there was any mischance, I should be to blame.

The clerk led me past the counter and let me out. I turned left and went across the place toward the church, for I must at least discover what had happened about the broken porcelain. Marie-Noël had said something about the porte de ville. I went back in the direction I had seen her take, beyond the car. Although irritated now and anxious, I was at the same time struck by the beauty of the town, the curious charm of canals winding peacefully past the old houses, little foot-bridges leading across the water to back gardens, roofs yellow with age. At last I came to the porte de ville itself, an ancient gateway to the once fortified town, with a stone bridge where the drawbridge used to be. I passed under the archway to what was evidently the main shopping street, and at once I saw, on the right-hand side, the place that the child must have meant, an antique shop with china and silver in the window. But the door was fast shut, and there was a notice saying they closed from midday until three.

I turned away, and then saw that a man was watching me from a shop on the opposite side of the street.

"Bon jour, Monsieur le Comte," he said.
"Are you looking for madame?"

"It doesn't matter," I said. "It's not important."

A sort of half-smile appeared on his face.
He seemed amused. "I don't wish to be indiscreet," he said, "but madame can't hear the bell when the door is shut. It would be better to take the garden entrance."

I had no intention of walking into any back garden and disturbing the antique merchant during the siesta hour. I thanked him, and went back under the porte de ville, and glancing leftward, in vague curiosity, saw how the shops and houses of the narrow main street backed onto the canal, and that the rear of the antique shop was in reality a small eighteenth-century house, with a balcony and strip of garden fronting the canal. A narrow plank bridge led from the road to the garden. As I stood there, pausing to light a cigarette, someone came out on to the balcony to feed the birds, and I recognized the blond woman in the bright blue coat who had laughed at Marie-Noël and myself in the market place. Was she the keeper of the antique shop?

"Excuse me, madame," I called. "I tried the shop just now, but the door was locked. Did my daughter visit you this morning?"

The woman turned round, surprised, and then to my intense astonishment burst into laughter. "Idiot," she said. "I thought you'd gone home. What are you doing, hanging about at the street corner and playing the fool?"

The familiarity, the use of the intimate
"tu," shook me off balance. I could only stare, wondering how to answer in character. She looked away past the porte de ville to the Place Saint-Julien. The streets were empty.

"There's no one about," she said. "Come on in."

The reputation of Jean de Gué in Villars was evidently a light one. I hesitated, and then, glancing across the square, saw the decisive factor in favor of acceptance. It was Renée, whom I had forgotten. With a sudden flood of realization I remembered that, now Marie-Noël had disappeared, I should have to drive Renée back to St. Gilles alone.

The woman in the blue coat followed my eyes and saw my dilemma. "Quick," she said.
"She hasn't seen you."

I dashed across the little bridge and onto the balcony, and, laughing still, she pulled me into the room.

"There's luck," she said. "A moment later she'd have caught us."

She shut the window and turned, smiling.

"That child of yours is adorable," she said, "but it was very naughty of you to send her here. And why for heaven's sake did you wrap those pieces of broken porcelain in cellophane and paper with a card addressed to me?" She put her hand in the pocket of her blue coat and pulled out a piece of crumpled cellophane. "I'll see to your broken porcelain, and anything else you care to send in from St. Gilles, but don't use your child or your wife or your sister as your deputy, because it's making fools of them and I have too much respect for your family."

She dived into the other pocket and produced a crumpled card. On it was written "For my beautiful Béla from Jean." The porcelain dog and cat lay in pieces on a table.

Although she had closed the long window, the billowing casement curtains masking the view, the room was full of sun. I had an impression of blue-gray walls and white cushions, but the effect, instead of being cold, was light as air. The dahlias that I had seen her carrying from the market place were red and gold, and now they spilled in profusion from a vase in the corner. There was a bowl of fruit upon a table, a bookcase, a Marie Laurencin drawing hanging above the fireplace. Deep chairs stood about the room, and a Persian cat cleaned its paws in one of them. Close to the window was a low flat table with artist's materials upon it, brushes and a special sort of paper. There was a smell of apricots

"What are you doing in Villars in the middle of the day?" she asked.

"I went to the bank," I said, "and forgot the time. I was supposed to pick up one of the family from the coiffeur."

"You've left it rather late," she said. "Does she enjoy walking about the streets?" She went to a cupboard and brought out a bottle of Dubonnet and glasses. "Where's the child?"

"I don't know. She disappeared in a lorry with some workmen."

"That shows good taste. You've brought her up well. Are you going to have lunch with me? It's all here—ham, salad, cheese, fruit and coffee." She opened a hatchway between this room and another, and there was a tray laid ready, with food upon it.

"How can I," I asked, "with my sister-in-law waiting for me outside?"

She went over to the window and opened it and looked out. "She's not there any more. If she has any sense she will go and sit in the car, and then, when she becomes tired of waiting, drive it back to St. Gilles."

I wondered if Renée could drive. I did not care. I felt suddenly devoid of responsibility, and content to let things take their course. Jean de Gué had too many women in his life.

"You can imagine how I felt," she said, "when Vincent told me that your small daughter was in the shop asking if we would mend something very precious belonging to her mother. I didn't even know if you were back from Paris, and for one moment I thought your wife had found out that I had done the miniature. Did you give it to her? Did she like it?"

I paused a moment, considering my words. "Yes," I said, "yes, it was a great success."

"And you managed to get the setting I told you about? They kept the locket for you, after my telephone call?"

"I did. It was quite perfect."

"I'm so glad. It was a marvelous idea of yours, and must have come to you in one of your better moments. The child said her mother had been very much upset by the breakage this morning, so I gathered the dog and cat were precious. They won't mend, of course, but I can get duplicates from Paris. They're Copenhagen—I suppose you realized that? Come on, let's eat."

She laid the table, drawing it up to my chair, and I thought to myself that this was, so far, the most effortless moment of my masquerade. The only trouble was Renée, walking the streets of Villars, getting angrier every moment.

Jean de Gué's Béla must have divined my thought, for she said, "Vincent will be back from lunch directly. When he comes I'll send him out to see if she's in the car. Did you leave it in the Place de la République?"

"Yes."

"Don't worry. She'll drive it home. It's what I should do in her place. And then Gaston can bring it back again. Were you joking when you said the child had gone off in a lorry?"

"No, it's true. They gave me the message in the bank. She and the lorry had disappeared when I came up from the vaults."

"What were you doing in the vaults?"

"Looking in my safe."

"That must have been a shock to you."

"It was."

I was eating the ham and the salad and breaking bread, and it struck me how much more pleasant was lunch today, with the woman opposite me, than it had been yesterday at the château. This train of thought led me to the one undelivered present.

"There's a bottle of scent for you," I said, "on the table in the dressing room at St. Gilles."

"Thank you. Am I supposed to go and fetch it?" she asked.

I told her without lying, able to laugh at now, about the mistake in the initial B.

She looked bewildered. "I don't see how it happened," she said, "since you never speak to your sister. Or had you really brought her something as a peace offering at long last?"

"No," I answered. "My mind wasn't functioning properly. Too much to drink in the Mans the day before."

"You must have been insensible and deaf drunk to have made a blunder of that magnitude," she said.

"I was both."

She raised her eyebrows. "The visit to Paris was not successful?"

"Very unsuccessful."

"Carvalet weren't co-operative?"

"They wouldn't extend the contract on old terms. I came back and told my brother Paul they had. My family and the workmen at the verrerie all believe it has gone through. Yesterday I reopened negotiations on the telephone, and the result is an extension of the contract on their terms. Nobody knows but me. That's why I went to the bank this morning—to see if I can stand the loss. I still don't know the answer."

I looked up from eating and saw the wide blue eyes fixed upon me. "What do you mean, you don't know the answer?" she said. "You told me before you went to Paris that if Carvalet wouldn't agree to your terms you were going to close down."

"I don't want to close down," I said. "It wouldn't be fair to the workpeople."

There was the sound of a door in the distance. She got up and went to the passage. "Is that you, Vincent?" she called.

"Yes, madame."

"Go and see if the Comte de Gué's car is in the Place de la République, and if there is a lady waiting in it."

"Very good, madame."

She came back and brought me the basket of fruit and the cheese, and poured me another glass of wine.

"You seem," she said, "to have made rather a mess of things since you returned. What are you going to do about it?"

"I haven't the slightest idea," I said. "I'm living from day to day."

She cut a slice of Gruyère cheese and gave it to me. "You know," she said, "it's a good thing, now and again, to take stock of one's life in life. To see where one has gone wrong. I sometimes wonder why I go on living here in Villars. I barely make a living out of the shop and I exist mainly on what Georges left me, which is precious little these days."

Was Georges perhaps a husband? Common of some sort seemed necessary.

"Why do you go on living here?" I asked.

She shrugged her shoulders. "Habit, I suppose. I'm fond of this little house. If you think I exist for your occasional visits, you flatter yourself."

She smiled, and I wondered whether Jean de Gué did flatter himself. Either way, the result was beneficial.

"Do you think," she asked, "that your sudden feeling for the verrerie is because it is, after all, two hundred and fifty years old, and you may be going to have a son at last?"

"No," I said. "My feeling for it comes from ving looked on it yesterday with new eyes. vatched the men working there for the first ne. I realized they had a certain pride in it, d a feeling for its owner too. If the verrerie ses down they will be deceived in him, dis- isioned, quite apart from being out of a ."

"It is pride, then?"

"I suppose it is. Pride of a sort."

She began to peel a pear and gave me the arters from it. "You make a mistake leaving much of the administrative part to your ther. If you weren't so infernally lazy you uld do it yourself. I sometimes won- ——" She paused, and began to peel an ple for herself.

"What do you wonder?"

"No . . . it would be probing, and I never be."

"Go on," I said, "I'm curious."

"It's only," she said, "I sometimes wonder your lack of feeling for the verrerie is be- use you don't want to think about it too ply. You don't want to be reminded about at happened to Maurice Duval."

I was silent. This was the fringe of some- ng. The man Jacques had spoken of aurice Duval: he was the man in the photo- ph album by the side of Jean de Gué.

"It could be," I said slowly.

"You see," she said softly, "you don't nt me to probe."

On the contrary, it was essential to find out I could about Jean de Gué. "No," I said, ou're wrong. I want you to on talking about it."

She took her eyes off mine d looked above my head, o the distance.

"The occupation was over een years ago," she said; s part of it. Yet people go remembering him—what a man he was, and how he d. It can hardly make for ce of mind for those in- ved."

There was a tap at the door d a small thin man, wearing eret, looked into the room. smiled when he saw me.

"Bon jour, Monsieur le nte," he said. "It's nice to you. How are you?"

"Very well, thank you, very well," I told .

"There was no lady in the car. But there this note on the seat."

He handed it to me with a bow.

It was short and to the point: "I have been king for you and Marie-Noël for nearly an r. I have hired a car to take me back to Gilles. R." I showed it to my hostess.

"Now you can relax," she said. "Vincent, dear and put these things through to the hen, will you?"

"Yes, madame."

He cleared away the table and fetched ciga- es and coffee. "I'm rather glad you have sudden sentiment for the verrerie," she . "It shows you have more feeling than pretend. I still don't see, though, if it's ng money and you've arranged an even se contract than before, how you can sibly afford to keep it running."

"Nor do I," I said.

"What about that friend who comes to ot with you? He advises you, doesn't He'd be the one to ask."

He had thrown off the bright blue jacket, aling a thin wool frock of indeterminate r. It was restful to look upon her, and to w that in this room nothing was expected ne. I wondered how often Jean de Gué e here and sat with his head against a nion, as I was doing now. Her casual friend- ss was disarming, yet inviting too. I picked the cat and stroked it.

"Can't you sell some securities, or some ?" she asked. "What about your wife? money's tied up, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"Unless you have a son. I remember now." He poured me out another cup of coffee. "How is your wife? Who's looking after e?"

"Doctor Lebrun," I said.

"He's getting rather old, isn't he? I should have insisted on a specialist. You've been oddly detached about it all along. I hope you show more sympathy at home."

I stubbed out my cigarette. "I'm not really detached," I said. "I try to show sympathy. The trouble is, I don't know enough about Françoise."

She gazed at me thoughtfully. The candid eyes were disconcerting. "What's the matter?" she said. "It's not just finance, is it? It goes much deeper. What really happened to you in Le Mans?"

I thought of the old childhood game of hunt-the-thimble. I used to play it with a maiden aunt. It was a restful, easy game for the adult, who did not have to move but only to close her eyes while I, the child, tiptoed about a sitting room filled with furniture and, heart beating, hid the thimble behind a clock. I closed my eyes, and went on stroking the cat upon my knee. Safety lay in evasion, and in the truth as well.

"You said something a little while ago about taking stock of oneself," I said. "Perhaps that's just what I've been doing, over a period of time, and it came to a head that evening in Le Mans. The self I knew had failed. The only way to escape responsibility for failure was to become someone else. Let another personality take charge."

She did not say anything. I suppose she was considering. I could not see because my eyes were closed.

"The other Jean de Gué," she said, "the one who's been hidden for so long beneath the surface gaiety and charm, I've often wondered if he existed. If he's going to emerge, he'd better do so now. We all have our multiple selves. But no one avoids responsibility that way. The problems remain to be tackled just the same."

"No," I said, "you've missed the point. The problems and responsibilities are new because the man in charge is somebody else."

"How does he seem to you, then, the man in charge?"

The great church in Villars sounded two o'clock. The sonorous bell of any church always rings a summons, and this one was far too near for peace of mind.

"Sometimes I see him without any feeling at all," I said, "and sometimes with far too much. One moment he's considering murdering those closest to him, and the next he's giving up his life for a stranger. He says he believes that the only motive which moves the human race is greed, and by ministering to this greed he himself survives. I think he has twisted ideas, but he's terribly near to the truth."

I heard her get up, put my coffee cup on a tray, and carry the tray to the hatch. Then she came back and sat on the arm of my chair.

"The man in charge," I said; "why does he buy you 'Femme'?"

"Because he likes the smell, and so do I."

"Do you suppose that's ministering to greed?"

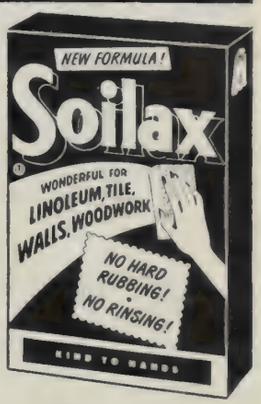
"It depends on the size of the bottle."

"It's a very big bottle."

"Then I call it foresight."

I was not sure if I knew the scent of Femme. I had never given anyone a bottle, and most scented women I avoided and abhorred. This one was not scented: she smelled of apricots.

"The thing is, it isn't greed at all," I said. "It's hunger. That's where he's wrong. And if it's hunger, what about the conflicting claims? Mother, wife, child, brother, sister-in-law, even workpeople—I can't satisfy them all. Frankly, I don't know where to start or what to do."



She did not answer, but I felt a soothing hand on my head. Anonymity closed in upon me. I was on a border sea between two worlds.

I put out my hands and felt her face. "I don't want to have to think," I said.

She laughed and, hardly brushing them, kissed my closed eyes. "That's why you come here, isn't it?" she said.

*From the Pacific Northwest

When I came away from the house the sun of late afternoon had turned all the lichen-colored roofs to gold. Shutters had been flung back and doors were open in the shopping street. In the avenue of plane trees, close to the market place, beside which lorries and carts had parked during the bustle of morning, old men and women now sat basking in the warmth before the air turned chill, while smaller children, chattering like birds, shuffled the falling leaves and kicked the dust.

The light of the late day gave warmth and color; this was a friendly town where people smiled. The Renault, waiting in the Place de la République, was suddenly familiar as my own, and Marie-Noël's white plastic bag, left on the back seat where she had thrown it with the market purchases, was not like any object in a stranger's car, but full of meaning. It seemed to me that nothing would move me now, neither tears from Françoise nor tantrums from Renée. The mother could be coaxed with affection, the child indulged to a limit set by reason; none of them seemed a problem, as they had during those first forty-eight hours under the château roof.

I remembered the correct turnings to St. Gilles, and as I drove down the lime avenue, over the bridge, through the gateway to the drive and under the archway of the moat to the outbuildings my confidence was supreme. Nothing could daunt me now. I found myself in a yard containing two garages with doors flung wide. As I got out of the car, the old woman I had spoken to in the cowshed the day before emerged from the entrance, and I heard her call over her shoulder to someone.

I went back under the archway, and the retriever ran forward in his enclosure, barking. I stood still, calling him softly by name, but, doubtful, he continued barking, his tail wagging uncertainly at the same time, and I went to the gate of his run and waited for him to smell my clothes. He sniffed, puzzled, not satisfied, and I saw the man in overalls watching from the stableyard.

"What's the matter with César?" he said.

"Nothing," I answered. "I must have startled him, that's all."

"If he behaves like that on Sunday he won't be much use to you," said the man. "Shall I give him a dose of oil after his food?"

"No," I told him. "Let him alone. He'll soon recover."

I wondered what was expected of the dog on Sunday. Perhaps if I took him myself for exercise he would come to know me, and the suspicious bark give way to whines of welcome.

I went up the steps to the terrace, and as I entered the hall Paul came out of the cloakroom to the right of the stairs.

"Where have you been all day?" he asked. "We've been trying to get you since one o'clock. Renée had to come back in a hired car, and then, to our astonishment, Marie-Noël turned up alone, announcing that she'd had a lift in the lorry. Lebrun waited until two, and then had to go. He's just been through to me again."

"What's wrong?" I inquired.

"What's wrong?" he repeated. "Only that Françoise isn't at all well, and Lebrun has forbidden her to move from bed."

The contempt in his voice was something I had to accept. The fault was not Jean de Gué's, but mine. I had promised to be back in time to see the doctor.

"What's his number?" I asked. "I'll get on to him at once."

"No use," he said. "He's been called out again. I told him to try you later this evening."

He turned and disappeared into the library. I went straight upstairs and along the corridor to the bedroom. Françoise was lying against her pillows with closed eyes. She opened them as I came into the room.

"Oh, it's you," she said, "at last. I'd given you up long ago. I told them you'd probably taken the train back to Paris."

The voice was flat, expressionless. I went up to the bed and took her hand.

"I should have telephoned," I said. "I was held up in Villars, and frankly I forgot. I don't even ask you to forgive me. How are you feeling? Paul tells me Lebrun has ordered you to stay in bed."

The hand in mine felt limp and cold. She did not take it away. "If I don't I shall lose the baby," she said. "It's what I've been afraid of all along. I've always known something would go wrong."

"It won't go wrong," I said; "not if you take care. The question is, how good is Lebrun? Wouldn't you like me to call in a specialist?"

"No," she said. "I don't want a stranger interfering at this point, upsetting me, upsetting Lebrun. I shall be all right as long as I stay quiet and nobody worries me. What with Marie-Noël coming back on the workmen's lorry, and Renée having to hire a car, because you disappeared, I've been almost frantic."

The tired eyes searched my face, and I knew that the only answer was to keep as near to the truth as possible.

"I had a long session at the bank," I said. "I don't mind telling you, but I don't want the others to know. The fact is, I lied about the contract. I didn't succeed in getting an extension when I was in Paris, and only managed to arrange things by telephone, and through the bank, today. They've agreed to continue the contract, but on their terms. It means the verrerie working at an even greater loss than before, but it can't be helped. Somehow I shall have to find the money."

She looked bewildered. "What was the point of lying? I don't understand."

"I suppose it was pride," I said. "I wanted everyone to believe I had succeeded. Well, perhaps I have succeeded, for a time. I haven't been into all the figures yet. But I want you to keep this to yourself. I don't intend telling maman, or Paul, or anyone except you unless things turn out to make it absolutely necessary."

She smiled for the first time. "I won't tell anybody," she said. "I'm only too glad that you've taken me into your confidence for once. It's funny, though, that you've bothered so much about the verrerie. The idea of closing down never seemed to worry you as it did Paul and Blanche."

"No," I said, "perhaps not. It began to worry me yesterday, when I went there."

She asked me to give her a comb and looking glass from the dressing table and, sitting upright against the bunched pillows, she combed the lank fair hair away from her face.

"Why didn't you tell me the night you came back?" she said.

"I hadn't decided," I replied. "I wasn't sure what I was going to do."

"Paul's bound to find out," she said. "Besides, what does it matter if he does know, since you've fixed the contract? Anyway, all these things will be solved when the boy is born." She put the mirror back on the table beside the bed. "Marie-Noël said you were down in the vaults at the bank. Is our marriage settlement there?"

"Yes."

"Did you look at it?"

"I did glance through it."

"If we have another daughter there's nothing to be done, is there?"

"No, apparently not."

"What happens if I die? You get everything, don't you?"

"You're not going to die. Now, shall I close the shutters and draw the curtains and put on your light? Have you anything to read?"

She was silent. She lay back on her pillows. Then she said, "You might get me the locket you brought me from Paris. I think I'll keep it here beside me, on the table."

I went to the dressing table, took the jewel case I saw there, and gave it to her.

She put the locket, with the miniature open, on the bedside table. "You'd better go down and make your peace with Renée," she said. "I was feeling too ill to cope with her when she arrived back—you know how impossible she can be when she loses her temper."

"She'll get over it."

I closed the shutters, and then I put a log on the fire.

"I suppose the child's with Blanche," she said, "or upstairs with maman. Tell her I didn't mean what I said this morning, that I was ill and wretched."

"I think she understood that."

"What did you do with the broken pieces?"

"Never mind. I've seen to them. Is there anything else you want?"

"No. No, I shall just go on lying here quietly."

I went through the bathroom to the dressing room and changed my shoes and coat. The bottle of Femme was still standing on the table. I put it away in a drawer, and because the drawer had a key something made me turn the key and slip it into my pocket. I went out into the corridor and at the foot of the stairs I came face to face with Charlotte.

"Monsieur le Curé has just gone," she said. "Madame la Comtesse has been asking for you."

"I'll go to her now," I said.

Once again she preceded me up the stairs, as on my first evening. "Monsieur le Comte was detained a long time in Villars?" asked Charlotte.

I knew I was right to mistrust her and dislike her, and that every word she spoke was subservient and false.

"Yes," I said.

"Madame Paul had tea with Madame la Comtesse this afternoon," she continued. "She was very put out that she had been obliged to hire a car to bring her back, and she told Madame la Comtesse the whole story."

"There was no story," I said. "I was detained, that was all."

We were now in the upper corridor, and I walked past her and on to the room beyond. I entered, to be greeted with the usual yapping from the dogs, and went to the chair by the fire, where the mother was sitting, her massive shoulders draped in a purple shawl. I bent and kissed her.

"Good morning and good evening," I said. "I'm sorry I never came to see you this morning. I left early. Have you had a good day?"

The mocking, questing eyes met mine, and she grunted and pointed to a chair.

"Sit down," she said, "there, with the light on your face, so that I can see you. Get out, Charlotte. Go down to the kitchen and order two trays for dinner." She remained silent until the servant went out of the room. I lighted a cigarette, feeling her eyes upon me. "Well," she said, "where were you?"

I guessed that everything Renée and Marie-Noël knew of my morning had been already told: the drive to Villars, the expedition to the market, the visit to the bank. The fact that she asked where I had been showed ignorance of the house by the canal. This was something, then, which Jean de Gué withheld from his mother.

"I had business," I said.

"You left the bank before half past twelve," she said, "and it's now half past six."

"Perhaps I drove to Le Mans," I said.

"Not in the Renault. The car was in the Place de la République all afternoon. The man who drove Renée home reported seeing it when he returned to the garage in Villars. I told Renée to telephone and ask him."

I smiled. "If you want the truth," I said, "I was trying to avoid Renée. And I succeeded. That's all I'm going to tell you. You can question me until midnight and you won't be any the wiser."

She chuckled, and I saw that once again my instinct not to lie had proved my salvation. "I don't blame you," she said.

"She hasn't enough to do," I said. "None of you women have enough to do."

"I had plenty to do once," she said, "when your father was alive, in the old days, before the war and before you married. There were no women sitting about idle then. Empty-headed fools like Françoise and Renée were children in their teens. I had something to live for. So had Blanche."

The sudden venom in her voice startled me. I looked up, and the mouth was narrow, hard, like her daughter's, and the eyes that had mocked me a moment ago were veiled under the hooded lids.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"You know very well what I mean," she said, and then, as swiftly as it had come, her expression changed again. "I'm old and ill, that's my trouble," she said, "and it bores me as it will bore you when your time comes. How is Françoise this evening?"

"As you know, I missed Lebrun," I said. "He's going to telephone me later. She has to stay in bed. She isn't at all well."

I watched her fingers beating a tattoo on the arm of her chair. "I saw Lebrun myself," she said. "He won't tell you any more than he told me. He's a bungler, and he won't admit it. She's going to have trouble with the baby, just as she did with the last—I've known it all along."

The tattooing on the chair arm continued. I watched it, oddly fascinated. "François doesn't want a specialist," I said. "I suggested it just now."

"You suggested it? Whatever for?"

"Why surely," I said, "if there's going to be difficulty, any sort of trouble ——" And for some reason, her eyes meeting mine, discomfort seized me. I remembered the terms of the marriage settlement, and that if François died without giving birth to a son the whole vast dowry would be divided between Jean de Gué and Marie-Noël.

The room, already stifling, became suddenly unbearable. I got up, loosening my collar. I felt her eyes upon my back as I went over to the window, but she did not say anything as I stood there, wrestling with the shutters. I threw them back, lifting the sash of one of the windows, and leaned out, drawing in a deep breath of air. Dusk had come, and with it mist.

I shut the window and looked back into the room. She was watching me still.

"What's wrong with you?" she said. "You're nervous, aren't you?"

Her eyes flickered away from me, looked at everything in the room but me. "I don't see why you want it," she said at last. "I don't see why you want to have this baby. Maman thinks it is a nuisance. She told Aunt Renée a long time ago that she wished she didn't have to have it."

Her question, so full of anxiety, was surely logical. Why was her mother obliged to have a child she did not want? I wished she could have asked the reason of Jean de Gué. I made a sorry substitute.

"It's peculiar," I said, "and rather cold-blooded, really. Your Grandfather Bruyère had a lot of money. He tied it up in such a way that your father and mother can't use any of it unless they have a son. So, even though they are perfectly content with their one daughter, it would make things much easier financially if they could have a son."

The instant look of relief upon her face was as though she had been given a blessed antidote to physical pain. "Oh," she said, "is that all? Just for money?"

"Yes," I said. "Mercenary, isn't it?"

"Not at all," she said. "I think it's very sensible. Does it mean the more boys you have, the more money you and maman get for yourselves?"

"Hardly," I said. "It just works for one."

In an excess of emotional release she slipped off my knee and turned a somersault from the sofa onto the floor, dressing gown and night-gown flying over her head. Shouting with laughter, her head hidden in the bunch of clothes, her quarters bare, she walked backward to the screen as Blanche and Renée and Paul came into the room.

Blanche stood still, her eyes fastening on the naked, capering animal into which the child had turned. "What do you think you're doing?" she said swiftly. "Pull down your dressing gown at once."

Marie-Noël turned, shook herself free and, perceiving her adult audience, stood and smiled.

"It's all right, Aunt Blanche," she said. "Papa and maman only do it for money, not because they want children. And that's why everyone in the world tries for boys—it's good for finance." She ran toward me and caught my hand. "You know, papa," she said, "Aunt Blanche told me that after you were born, when she was a little girl, everyone stopped loving her, and it was one of the lessons in humility that turned her to God. But when my little brother arrives everything will go on just the same. You will love me as much as ever, and perhaps the Sainte Vierge will teach me a different lesson in humility, not the one she taught Aunt Blanche."

It must have struck her that the frozen faces of her aunts and uncle did not reflect her own happiness. She glanced at me uncertainly, then back again to the sisters-in-law. Of the two women, Renée, if it were possible, looked the more outraged. The child sensed this, and smiled at her graciously.

"After all," she said, "there are other virtues besides humility. I could learn to have patience, like Aunt Renée. It's not everyone who can grow a baby. She has been married for three years to Uncle Paul, and nothing has happened to her yet."

It seemed to me that I had reason to bless Françoise: her weakness gave me an excuse for absence upstairs. It was far simpler to sit with her in the bedroom than down below in the salon with Paul and Renée. I went upstairs and put the child to bed; and when she was settled and tucked in for the night I returned to Françoise and did the same for her. Her gratitude was intense. She kept saying, in wonder and surprise, that I was kind.

"It's nothing," I answered. "What else would you expect?"

"I'm not used to it," she said. "You're not thoughtful as a rule. I've often come up early to bed and you've stayed down talking to Paul and Renée. But perhaps you're avoiding them tonight in case they ask you what you were doing in Villars?"

She was as intuitive in her own way as the child was in hers, and I wondered, as I kissed her and turned out the light, whether she s I went back to the dressing room, I re-nbered the letter from the lawyer Talbert ch I had brought away from the bank. It still in my pocket, and I took it out and d it. It was mercifully clear. The verrerie, he , was running at a steady loss and bank-cy could be avoided only if it was sub-zed from some other source—by the sale of d or securities, for instance, as Béla had gested. The writer said that he would be l to come to St. Gilles and discuss the mat-with me. Presumably it was this letter ch had made it so vital that Jean should see Carvalet people and persuade them, if he ld, to agree to more favorable terms.

he following day was Saturday, and I de-d to go down to the verrerie first thing in morning, before Paul, to see if there was a er from Carvalet. The directors could dly have consulted before Friday, and a er written afterward would surely arrive to-. I was up and round to the garage for the before Gaston had come to brush my hes and take away my tray. This time ar let me pass without barking, and when I ched through his gate to pat him, and he gged his tail, I felt that I had scored a tri-ph.

I thought Carvalet might have written," I d. "I'm expecting a personal letter from the ector. Have you the mail there?"

He looked down at the small pile of letters his hand. Second from the top was a long elope with the Carvalet stamped address.

There it is," I said. "Thank you, Jacques." took it from him, and discreetly he moved ay while I read the letter. It was all right. It firmed the telephone conversation and en-sed the contract, extending a further six nths, drawn up in the new terms.

Jacques," I said, "have you got our con-t there? The old one?"

You have it, Monsieur le Comte," he said, the file on your desk."

Look for it, will you," I asked, "and I'll ice through the rest of the mail."

e did not question me, but the expression his face showed bewilderment. I watched n search through a file while I flipped ough the remaining letters, which were s and receipts. He handed me the contract hout a word, and I sat down at the desk and pared the two. The wording was identical, ept for the crucial matter of the terms of . Knowing nothing of the business, I could least seize the salient fact that in the future rvalet would pay less for the products sent m.

felt in my pocket for the lawyer's letter laid it before me, beside the contracts. "I nt to run through the figures," I said to ques. "Wages, production costs, the whole fit."

He stared. "You saw them recently. You Monsieur Paul and I checked everything ore you went to Paris."

I want to do it again," I said.

t took us about an hour and a half. When had done, and he went through to the hen to make some coffee, I was able to pare the final figures he had given me with at they would become under the new con-t. The answer was that something in the ure of five million francs would have to be nd from the personal account of Jean de é to balance costs. I saw his reason for clos-ing down. There was nothing else he could do, if he did not want to sell land or securities. The glass foundry had been losing money under the old contract; under the new one it ceased to exist as a business at all. It became a luxurious toy. My blundering sentiment had cost the owners dear.

I took the new contract, put it with both the letters in my coat pocket, and went through to the kitchen to find Jacques.

"There, Monsieur le Comte," he said, "a little refreshment after so much work." He handed me a cup of steaming coffee. "I am still marveling at your success in Paris. It proves the value of personal contact."

"No one," I said, "will be out of work. That's the important thing."

He raised his eyebrows. "Were you so concerned about the men? I hadn't realized that. Actually, after the first shock they would soon have found employment. They've been prepared for a closedown for a long time."

I drank my coffee, disillusioned. Perhaps I had meddled to no purpose after all.

Someone knocked on the outer door and, excusing himself, he went back to the office. I looked about me, and saw that I was standing in a fair-sized kitchen that must once have done duty for a family, the door beyond leading through to the rest of the house. Curious, I opened it, and saw a broad stone passage, with other rooms leading off it and a staircase rising to the floor above. I crossed the passage and looked into the rooms. They were empty, unfurnished, the walls discolored. In the farthest room of all, a fine, square room with paneled walls, there were large pieces of furniture stacked against a wall, cases of crockery, the whole giving an appearance of neglect, as though the owner had put all his possessions to one side and forgotten about them. An old almanac was pinned to the wall, the date 1941, and beside it was a box of books. I bent down and opened one of the books. Inside was written "Maurice Duval."

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

By BET HART

Barbara J. is absolutely undaunted by gray skies and the fact that it may be many more days before the first real spring day. She decides now is the time to "organize" her wardrobe and takes special care to see that every hemline is just right and each accessory spanking bright. Her former fashion investments she can wear now and into spring, but at the same time Barbara thinks optimistically toward a new season and a new wardrobe. In the process of organizing and thinking, Barbara wisely invests a few of her fashion $'s in a dress—one which proves she is more than just dreaming of spring!

The dress is classic with its special beauty in the line—soft and rounded; the color—water-color blues; and the fabric—pure silk. The price for all these fashion points, $17.95. Entertaining "at home," Barbara wears the neckline closed, a rope of pearls, and her pink scarf at the waistline for an even brighter accent. For an elegant evening out, she wears her turquoise satin cummerbund and the neckline open with the ties fastened with her sparkle pin. Whether or not you are heading south on a cruise (our Barbara isn't), we suggest it as the perfect prescription for a wonderful midwinter lift!

Barbara makes a white cardigan. The collar is the same as on her new dress and can be worn covering the neckline of the dress or with the pretty turquoise collar as an accent on the outside. For two completely new costumes, she wears her black pleated skirt and, for evening, her white chiffon with the sweater. It is also especially pretty at the office over her gray jumper. The dress with the look of southern climates, but equally pretty for nonvacationers for now and later on. Utterly flattering in its soft lines and heavenly color. A favorite neckline of Barbara's: a soft tie going into a V at the back. The neck can be worn closed (as shown here) or open.

I heard footsteps coming through from the direction of the kitchen. Jacques stood in the doorway, watching me.

"Were you looking for something, Monsieur le Comte?" he asked.

"Why do we go on keeping all this?" I said, pointing to the furniture.

He stared at me, then shifted his eyes. "It's for you to say, Monsieur le Comte."

I looked away from him, back to the stored furniture.

"It seems such a waste," I said.

"Indeed, yes," he answered.

I considered whether I dared venture a question, a question that Jean de Gué would never have put because he would know the answer. "Do you think we ought to make use of these rooms?" I said. "Get someone to live in the house, instead of letting it stand empty?"

At first he did not answer. He went on standing there, ill at ease. Then he said, "Who would you suggest should come here now?"

"Why don't you live here yourself?" I asked.

His discomfort became even plainer. "My wife and I are very content where we are in Lauray," he said. "It is, after all, no farther than you are at St. Gilles. My wife likes to be where there is company. It would be too isolated for her here; besides which ——" He broke off, distressed.

"Besides what?" I asked.

"Everybody would think it a little strange," he said. "No one has lived here for so long, and then . . . you must excuse me, Monsieur le Comte, but there are not very happy memories connected with the house when it was last inhabited." Once more he hesitated, and then, seeming to gather courage, went quickly on. "Monsieur le Comte, had there been fighting in the grounds of the verrerie, a battle between soldiers, that is something one accepts. But when the last man to live here, the master of the verrerie, Monsieur Duval, is woken from his bed in the middle of the night, and taken downstairs and shot by his own countrymen, and his body thrown into the well, cut to pieces with his own glass, even if it happened a long time ago and is something we all prefer to forget, yet it does not make anybody very anxious to come and live here where it happened, bringing a wife and family."

"No," I said slowly. "You are right, of course."

I turned and left the room and went along the stone passage to the kitchen, and thence to the office. I stood by the desk for a moment, looking down at the bills and receipts and letters. The verrerie would continue to run until somebody discovered there was no more money to pay the wages or the bills.

"If you will give me an envelope addressed to Monsieur Mercier at Carvalet," I said to Jacques, who came in at that moment, "I can post their copy of the contract on my way back. I'll keep the duplicate."

But his camaraderie had vanished. We were both thinking of the empty part of the house, and a return to finance and business was out of the question.

"I only came down about the figures," I said. "There is no need to mention it to Monsieur Paul."

"No, Monsieur le Comte," he replied. He took an envelope out of the desk drawer and addressed and stamped it. As he gave it to me he said, the friendliness once more in his voice, "You are expecting me tomorrow? I think it's going to be fine. They gave a good forecast on the radio this morning."

He stepped forward to open the door for me, and I said, "Till tomorrow," and went out into the yard. Tomorrow was Sunday. Perhaps he and his wife came to Mass at St. Gilles and, with Doctor Lebrun, joined the family afterward.

I went past the sheds to the entrance of the verrerie, and there, standing by the small lodge, was Julie, her arms full of green stuff for her rabbits. I called good day to her, and once again I was struck by the honesty of her face, the warmth and shrewdness of the brown eyes. I knew that it was not sentiment on my part which made me trust her, but some intuition deep within myself that made me respond to her instinctively, as I had responded to Béla of Villars.

"You're an early one, Monsieur le Comte," she called. "It's not often we see you at the verrerie on a Saturday morning, either. How are you? And how is the young comtesse? Not so well yesterday, they told me."

News must travel fast in a small neighborhood. Then I remembered how she had taken Marie-Noël back to the château from Villars, and had talked no doubt to the servants afterward.

"She has to take things quietly," I said. "She was better last night when I got home. I must apologize, Julie. The child went and bothered you yesterday in Villars. I didn't realize what she intended to do—they gave me a muddled message in the bank."

She laughed and gestured with her hands. "It's not for you to apologize, Monsieur Jean, but for me to thank you. We were only too pleased to have her, a sunbeam in the dark lorry. She never stopped talking from Villars to St. Gilles."

I had followed her to the patch of ground beside the lodge, where the few square yards were crammed with vegetables and flowers, and I watched her feed the rabbits, talking to them all the while.

"Julie," I said—and I knew that what I was asking would seem strange to her—"Julie, how was it, here at St. Gilles, during the occupation?"

Oddly, she did not seem surprised at the question. "You understand, Monsieur Jean," she said after a moment, "that for a person like yourself, who was away fighting in the Resistance, war is something that is planned and carried out by the intellect. It is rather like a game that either succeeds or fails. But to those who are left behind it is very different. It is like being in a prison without bars, and nobody knows who is the criminal, who is the jailer, who is telling lies, which person has betrayed whom. People no longer have faith."

"But you," I persisted, "what did you do, Julie? What did you think?"

"Me?" she asked. "What could I do but go on living here, as I had done for years, growing my vegetables, feeding my hens, looking after my poor husband and saying to myself, 'This has happened before, it will happen again, it has to be endured.'"

She turned away from the hutch, wiping her hands on her apron. "Come in the lodge, Monsieur Jean. Let me show you something."

I followed her into the small building. There was a stove in one corner, with a pipe to the roof, a wooden table, a chair, and a cupboa the full length of the wall. She took a key fro a pocket in her skirt beneath the apron, a reached up to the locked cupboard. S searched among some papers and then brou out an exercise book, opened it, took an e velope from the middle, and from the envelo brought out a snapshot.

"There," she said. "You asked me abo the occupation. They accused me of being collaborator because of this boy."

The snapshot was of a young soldier German uniform. There was nothing ve striking about him. He was not posing, smiling, merely young.

"What did he do?" I asked.

"Do?" she said. "He did nothing. He w simply here for a few months, with ma others. He was in trouble one day. There w to be an inspection, and he had stained h uniform messing with some dye. He came me and asked, in his sign language with a fe words mixed in, if I could clean it, so that would not be punished. Monsieur Jean, thought of my own two boys, André who w a prisoner and Albert who was killed, a there was this boy of the same age standi there asking me to clean the stain on h jacket. Of course I cleaned it for him. And came back afterward and thanked me a gave me this snapshot. It made no differen to me whether he was German or Japanese had fallen from the moon. He was no dou killed later, like many others—they were born to die, those boys, ours as well. But cause I had cleaned his jacket, the mayor St. Gilles and many others did not speak me, no, not for two years. So you see, wh war comes to one's own village, one's o doorstep, it isn't tragic and impersonal a longer. That is why I am not a great patri Monsieur Jean, and why I do not care to c cuss the occupation in St. Gilles."

I gave her back the snapshot and she placed it in the cupboard. Then she turned me, her lined, weather-beaten face calm a impassive.

"So," she said, "everything is forgotten time. That's life. But if I had shown you th snapshot some years ago, Monsieur le Com I wouldn't be here today, would I? A co round the neck for old Julie, and the near tree in the forest out there."

I said nothing because I could not. I fel sudden absurd and impassioned desire to t

LIKE A TREE

In the lively poetry of the Bible, a "righteous man" is often likened to a tree. Let us see how the varied qualities of different trees are made to picture forth the nature of a man who "delights himself in goodness." In the First Psalm, for example, he is described as a tree planted by the rivers of water, bringing forth fruit in season, and maintaining his foliage unwithered. Isaiah, speaking of those blessed by the spirit of God, said that they spring up with the tenderness and grace of willows by the watercourses. The prophet Jeremiah said, "Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is, for he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river . . . not careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit." In the Fifty-second Psalm, the man who "rests in the Lord" is contrasted with one who trusts in his riches; he is portrayed as a green olive tree, fair, and of great beauty and goodly fruit. The Ninety-second Psalm depicts the good man as flourishing like the palm tree, growing like a cedar of Lebanon, and bringing forth fruit in old age. In the Bible, too, there are ancient traditions of sacred trees, under whose boughs a man could rest, breathe in prophetic insights, see visions and dream dreams. The grace of the palm, the strength of the cedar, the stability of the oak and the fruitfulness of the olive were all familiar to the people of Israel. The plumy imperial palm, symbol of victory and eternal life, enhanced the splendor of palaces and temples. The olive tree could continue bearing for twenty generations, and still surround itself with vigorous young shoots. The evergreen oaks were opulently beautiful. The cedars of Lebanon, said to have been growing since the Flood, had their timbers built into temples. No other figure of speech could express more beautifully the spirit of a good man, upright, steadfast, vital and serene; unperturbed by transient drought and storm, enduringly influential, comforting to those who reposed themselves against his strength. Such a man, like a tree, is "planted," and draws unfailing nourishment from high up and deep down, from the quickening sunlight, and the living waters always flowing about the roots of life. MARY K. BLACKMAR er, in the name of the Jean de Gué whom she elieved me to be, of my sorrow for everyhing that had happened to her over the years, or bitterness and poverty and suffering and oss. But it would, I knew, have startled and mbarrassed her, and instead I put my hand n her shoulder and gave her a pat. Then we ent out together and she opened the door for e and stood smiling, her arms crossed under er shawl.

I waved to her and drove away. I had learned ree things from my morning. First, that rough my telephone conversation to Carlet I had committed the glass foundry to a ourse which could only bring about its ruin; econdly, that the last, well-loved master of e foundry had been butchered on his own oorstep and his body flung down the well; nd thirdly, that the people of St. Gilles, like veryone else in the world, had seized defeat s an excuse to turn upon their friends.

Before I reached the village I stopped and rought out the contract. Then, reaching in y pocket for Jean de Gué's wallet, I took om it his driving license and opened it. The gnature was a typically flowing French one; had seen it, or its like, on hundreds of French ocuments in my travels and studies. A dozen ttempts at copying it were enough to give me nfidence. When I took up the contract and rote his name at the bottom of the page, De ué himself would have hesitated to denounce as a forgery. Then I drove down the hill to e village and through the gateway to the hâteau, stopping only to post the contract.

The front door stood wide open, and there as commotion in the hall. Gaston, with eeves rolled up, was edging a heavy sideoard through to the dining room, assisted by e man in overalls from the garage, Germaine nd the stalwart daughter of the woman who ashed the linen. As soon as Gaston saw me, nd while I was wondering how I could find ut what this furniture moving signified, he isped a message over his shoulder.

"Monsieur Paul has been looking for you l the morning, Monsieur le Comte," he said. He says you have given no orders yet to obert. Germaine, go through to the kitchen nd see if Robert is still there."

Germaine disappeared to the back regions. a moment the femme de chambre appeared ain, followed by a small, thick-set man with izzled hair, dressed in breeches and leggings. Here is Robert, Monsieur le Comte," she id.

"Good morning, Robert." I held out my nd to him. He shook it, smiling. "Well," I ked, "what is it you want to know?"

He looked up at me, puzzled. "It's for toorrow, Monsieur le Comte," he said. "I ought you would have sent for me yesterday discuss arrangements, but Gaston told me u were out all day and then, Madame la omtesse being unwell, I did not like to disrb you last night."

I stared down at him. We were alone. ermaine and the others had retired to the chen.

"Tomorrow," I repeated, "yes, of course. uite a number of people seem to be coming. ere you by any chance wondering what we re going to eat?"

e flinched as though the joke had gone too long. "Why, Monsieur le Comte," he d, "you know perfectly well it is nothing to with me what you eat. What I must know your program for the day. Monsieur Paul ys you have not discussed it with him."

"You don't think," I began cautiously, hat for once we might leave the arrangeents to Monsieur Paul?"

The man stared at me, astounded. "Why, onsieur le Comte," he exclaimed, "you have ver done such a thing in your life. Ever since onsieur le Comte your father died, it is you o have organized the Sunday of the grande asse."

This time it must have been I who looked, d certainly felt, as if he had made a joke in or taste. The grande chasse—idiot that I s. Tomorrow, Sunday, must be the big anual shoot in the district, centering in the domaine of St. Gilles, planned and organized by e seigneur, Jean de Gué.

"Listen, Robert," I said, "I've had a lot on mind since I came back from Paris, and frankly, I've not yet worked out tomorrow's program. I'll see you later."

He looked baffled, frustrated. "As you say, Monsieur le Comte, but there is much to be done. Will you see me at two o'clock?"

"At two o'clock," I said, and to be rid of him I went through to the lobby as though to telephone, and waited until I heard him pass through the service door. Then I crossed the hall and went out to the terrace and down to the shelter of the cedar tree that had been my refuge the first night. Two o'clock or midnight could make no difference; I should have no program and no plan. Lecturing on French history had not equipped me for la chasse: I did not shoot.

I walked swiftly across the moat to the path beneath the chestnuts, and so to one of the long rides and into the woods. It did not matter to me where I went; all I knew was that I had to put myself out of the range of call and somehow decide upon a course of action.

I wondered if I could make Françoise the excuse, but it was too much out of character. However sick his wife might be, it would not matter to Jean de Gué. I could, of course, take the car and disappear, make this my exit from the masquerade. Nothing prevented me from doing so, at any hour of the day or night. Now, perhaps, was the moment.

I crossed and recrossed the rides, now deep in the dark woods, then suddenly emerging to the light. I was filled increasingly with self-disgust. The sense of power and confidence had seeped away, and my likeness to Jean de Gué was nothing but a clown's covering. I had been very sure of myself driving away yesterday from Villars, with a picture in my mind of Béla feeding her birds on the balcony. I had been confident again this morning, coming from the foundry with the contract in my pocket. Now I was deflated, the bubble of conceit exploded, lost in the air.

As if it were a symbol mocking me, Jean de Gué's watch, which I wore on my left wrist, suddenly fell to the ground, smashing the glass. I bent and picked it up. The strap had given—I should have noticed it was worn. Irritated by this new mishap, I walked slowly on, the watch in my hand, and I saw that the naked hands now stood at half past twelve. It was almost time for the midday meal, for sitting at the head of the table in the dining room, for giving my orders for the shoot.

I came to the dovecot, and was protected now by its rounded walls, unseen from the château windows. Marie-Noël must have been playing here earlier, for her cardigan lay forgotten on the swing. I stood by the bonfire, stirring it with my foot, till the bitter, pungent smoke rose up and stung my eyes, and suddenly I was reminded of the well in front of the master's house in the verrerie. There were nettles here, too, and tangled grass, and Marie-Noël's swing looked as old and neglected as the well before the house. The rope had come unhitched again and lay thrown down, useless as the links of the chain; and as I looked at it I saw, in my mind's eye, the well chain wrapped about a man's limp body, binding it, and the body thrust down the deep black hole of the well to water.

Another puff of smoke came from the bonfire, blown by a gust of wind, and, as suddenly as the image of the dead man's body had come to me, I knew what I was going to do. I waited for the smoke to drift, then tossed the watch into the fire. I saw it fall against a heap of glowing embers. Then I knelt down and thrust my hand against them until I had the watch. I cried out with the searing agony of pain, and collapsed sideways onto the grass, clutching my hand, seizing leaves, grass, anything to cover the scorched flesh, while the broken watch lay forgotten beside me.

I lay a moment, waiting for the faintness to pass, and the retching that I could not prevent, and then, because of the intensity of the pain, I got to my feet and began to run toward the château. I had only one thought—to stop the pain. I remember stumbling across the threshold and falling onto the sofa. Then the darkness that I had sought was with me and about me, but the pain continued.

I heard Renée call for Paul, and Paul for Gaston, and I was surrounded by questioning, anxious faces, trying to uncover the hand that I still held against me, shielded by my coat. But I could only rock backward and forward, shaking my head, unable to tell them to go away, to leave me alone, because there was only one thing with me, which was pain.

Gaston said, "We must find Mademoiselle Blanche," and Renée ran out of the room screaming for Blanche. I heard Paul say he was telephoning for the doctor, and I thought dimly, through the pain, that if only I could faint the pain would stop. Gaston was kneeling beside me, and he asked, "Have you cut yourself, Monsieur le Comte?" and I said, "No, burned myself," turning away from him.

Then Blanche was there, kneeling where Gaston had knelt. She put out her hand to take mine, but I exclaimed, "No, it hurts too much." She said, "Hold him down," to Paul and Gaston, and they seized me by the shoulders and pinned me against the cushions. Blanche reached for my hand and covered it with something cool and cleansing that splayed all over the seared back of my burned hand. Then she put a bandage over it, and fastened it loosely. Slowly, very slowly the agony began to be something that could be borne.

"Is that better?" asked Paul, and I waited a moment and then said, "Yes, I think so." I saw that Marie-Noël had joined the circle and was staring down at me, her eyes enormous in her small white face.

"Whatever did you do? What happened?" asked Renée.

"My watch fell off my wrist into the bonfire," I said. "The bonfire out there by the dovecot. I bent to pick it up and burned myself. My own fault entirely. An idiotic, senseless thing to do."

"You must be completely crazy," said Paul. "You could have fished the watch out with a stick, any piece of wood by the bonfire."

"It never occurred to me."

"You must have been very close to the bonfire for it to have fallen off your wrist into the middle of it," said Renée.

"I was. The smoke got in my eyes. I couldn't see properly—that was part of the trouble."

"I've telephoned for Lebrun," said Paul. "He's coming out right away. The first thing he said was did Françoise know? I said no. He warned me she shouldn't be told. Just the kind of thing to upset her."

"I shall be all right," I said. "It's not hurting now. Blanche has worked wonders." I looked round for Blanche, but she had disappeared.

"One thing's evident," said Paul. "You'll be in no shape to shoot tomorrow."

"That's the first thing I thought of," I said.

They stared at me in sympathy. Gaston made a little clicking sound of vexation. "And it's not even his gold one. The gold one is still in Le Mans, being repaired. Monsieur le Comte has been wearing his old steel watch, the one Monsieur Duval gave him on his twenty-first birthday."

"That's why I didn't want to lose it," I said.

There was an odd silence. Paul offered me a cigarette.

Marie-Noël hadn't said a word all the time. I was sorry if I had frightened her. "Don't look so solemn," I smiled. "I'm all right now."

"Here's your watch," she said. She had been holding her hands behind her back. Now she advanced and held out the watch, blackened by the fire.

"Where did you find it?" asked Renée.

"In the ashes," she said.

I held out my left hand for the watch and put it in my pocket. "Now let's forget it," I said. "Why don't you start lunch? Clear out and leave me. I don't want any lunch. I'll see Lebrun in here when he comes."

I was now tired, and sick inside. My hand hurt in a different way. Not so much physically but in my mind, which was vividly aware of the raw tender flesh. I closed my eyes again, and they all went away.

Some time later there was a bell, and in a minute or two the elderly, bearded face of Doctor Lebrun was looking at me, pince-nez on the bridge of a large nose, side by side with the impassive Blanche.

"What have you been doing to yourself?" he asked. "They tell me you've been playing the fool with a bonfire."

Resigned to it now, and bored, I went over the story again, and to justify myself I pulled the blackened watch out of my pocket.

"Well," he said, "we all do foolish things now and again. Let's have a look at the damage. Mademoiselle Blanche, unwrap this for me."

Blanche, cool and calm, took my hand again between hers. The doctor anointed it with some ointment he had brought and did it up again, and to my intense relief they had neither of them hurt me. The pain was with me, but no longer active.

"There," said the doctor, "now you'll be more comfortable. It's not too serious, I assure you, and in a few days you won't be able to see where you hurt it. These dressings to be renewed night and morning, Mademoiselle Blanche, and I think we shall have no trouble. What concerns me most is that you won't be able to shoot tomorrow."

"Don't worry," I said. "You'll do quite as well without me."

"I'm afraid not." He smiled. "You're like the mainspring of the watch there," he said. "If that's out of action, the rest of the works collapse."

I saw Blanche looking at the watch, and from the watch to me. Our eyes met, and there was something questing, searching in her expression. Then she turned to the doctor and asked him to come with her to the dining room and have something to eat. He thanked her, saying he would follow her in a moment.

She left us alone and he began to talk about Françoise, repeating what he had told me on the telephone. Gaston appeared with a tray of food, but I waved him away.

"This evening you will feel like eating. Not now," said the doctor, and he gave me some tablets with instructions about one every two hours, and two if my hand pained me, and then went off to join the others.

When the family had finished lunch they came flocking back into the room to inquire after me, and I put the second part of my plan into action. "Paul," I said, "you can arrange everything for tomorrow with Robert. Now I'm out of it I prefer to be quit altogether."

"Oh, nonsense," exclaimed Paul. "You'll be feeling more like it in an hour or so. If Robert and I run it you'll only criticize us and say we've wrecked it."

"I won't," I said. "You go ahead. If I can't shoot, I'm not interested."

I got up from the sofa, telling them that I wanted to rest alone in the library, and I could tell by their faces that they believed my decision came from bitter disappointment, and also because I was still in pain.

As I went into the library, I realized that my penance worked both ways. I was spared the preparations for the shoot, only to doom myself to inactivity within, and after "resting" should be at the mercy of the inquiries that I wanted to avoid. To make the hours pass I pushed a chair over by the desk and, struggling one-handed with the drawer, pulled out the photograph album once again. This time I had no interruption. I could take my time. After looking again through the earlier snapshots I passed on to the adult pictures. I noticed things that had escaped me in my previous hurried glimpse. Maurice Duval appeared quite early in the groups at the verrerie. He was standing in a back row, a youngish man in a group that had the date 1925 beside it, then, rather like house groups at school, he advanced year by year to a more prominent position, until, toward the end of the album he was promoted to a chair beside the Comte de Gué himself. I liked his face. It was strong, wise, trustworthy, a face that surely would command affection and respect.

I closed the album and pushed it back into the drawer. Perhaps there were others, but with one hand useless I could not rummage for them. I still had the new contract in my pocket—I wondered what Maurice Duval would have thought of it. . . . I must have slept in the chair, because suddenly it was six o'clock, and it was not Paul or Renée or the child who had come to disturb me, but the curé. He had switched on the light beside the desk and was peering down at me.

"There now, I've woken you. I didn't intend to do that," he said. "I just wanted to make sure you were not in pain."

I told him all was well and the sleep had done me good.

"Madame Jean has also slept," he said. "And your mother too. I took it upon myself

As far as we can make out, this babyish creature has never found out that there is any way to get something other than by pushing others. It pushes and shoves anybody for anything and has made itself so unpleasant nobody in his right mind wants to play with it or even go near it. What a piggish, prickly Painful Pushy!

"I'm sorry," I said. "I'll come back when you've finished."

She turned blank eyes toward me, holding up her hand for silence, and I stood there waiting, uncertain what I was meant to do. But in a moment or two she crossed herself and laid her rosary at the feet of the Madonna, then stood up and climbed into bed.

"I was doing my stations of the cross," she said. "It puts me in the right state for Mass tomorrow. Aunt Blanche always says it helps to do the stations if one is thinking about something else."

"What were you thinking about?" I asked.

"This morning I was thinking about the shoot and what fun it would be," she said, "which I'm sure was a sin in itself. The rest of the day I've been thinking about you."

Her eyes were more puzzled than concerned. I was relieved. "You needn't worry about me," I said, tucking her up with one hand. "My hand is much better tonight and Doctor Lebrun told me it would be quite all right in a few days. It was a silly thing to happen, the watch falling off—I ought to have remembered that the strap was loose."

"But it didn't fall off," she said.

"What do you mean?"

She stared up at me, turning red, and began picking at the bedclothes in embarrassment. "I was in the dovecot," she said. "I had climbed up to the top, and was looking through that little gap beside the hole where the pigeons go in and out. I saw you come, swinging the watch in your hand. I was going to call out to you, but you looked so serious I didn't like to. Then you stood a few minutes by the bonfire, and suddenly you threw the watch right in the middle of it. There was no smoke getting in your eyes or anything. You did it on purpose. Why?"

flows out in sympathy to the lonely man. But if he takes his own woman protector with him, the natural instinct of the other women is overlaid by something competitive or critical, and they regard him as fair game to do what they like with." Members have therefore a choice of risks and remedies.

It was in 1921 that I was given my first ministerial appointment as Under-Secretary in the Colonial Office, Winston Churchill being Secretary of State. I saw it in the paper on April 1, 1921, before receiving any intimation from the Prime Minister, Lloyd George, and spent the next twenty-four or forty-eight hours in wondering whether it was genuine.

After this period of suspense, I approached the office not without trepidation, explaining to the uniformed doorkeeper who I was. The Secretary of State was away at the Cairo conference, trying to bring order into the sum of our new responsibilities in the Middle East, especially Iraq and Palestine, of which under the first League of Nations plan we were given the mandates. Rumor had it that he was feeling a double sense of annoyance, both at not having been given the Exchequer, which rather surprisingly went to Sir Robert Horne, and at being given myself as Under-Secretary when he would have liked somebody else. I did not know him at that time and felt slightly apprehensive of how closer acquaintance might work.

For some weeks it did not work at all, as in spite of constant efforts on my part he steadily refused to see me, and Eddie Marsh, who was his private secretary and anxious to make everything run smoothly, found increasing difficulty day after day in finding a plausible excuse. At last I managed somehow to force an entry into the presence. This being achieved, I got something off my chest to the effect that I had no more wanted to be Under-Secretary to him than he possibly had wanted me to be appointed. But as I was there I thought I had a right to be treated with reasonable consideration; or perhaps I may have said, like a gentleman.

From that day on, no one could have been kinder than Churchill was to me. He constantly sent for me to his room in the afternoon to have a glass of vermouth, and would talk about what was happening in politics, make entrancing comments on his colleagues, or ask my opinion on some speech that he was going to make, and I look back to the months with him at the Colonial Office as having seen the start of a much-valued friendship.

I have always remembered two or three very sound bits of advice that he gave me. "Do you speak from notes?" he asked me one day when I was due to introduce the Colonial Office estimates. I said I did. "That's quite all right. But never try to pretend to your audience that you're not using them. If you do that, you get them into a sort of competitive game of hide-and-seek with you, in which you're bound to lose. But if you are perfectly open about it, you can keep them waiting as long as you like while you find your place in your notes and put on your glasses to read them, and they won't mind at all."

It was a very shrewd comment on human nature; as was his prescription against worrying: "When you feel vaguely oppressed by you don't quite know what, a good plan is to write down all the things that you can think of as possible annoyances. Once they are down on paper, you can deal with them. 'This one doesn't mature for six months; I know the answer to this.' . . . 'This is the only real difficulty that is crying for an answer.' Then you deal with it. For you make it all manageable the moment you break it up into precise and concrete issues. The only thing that the human mind can't stand up against is mystery." Very sound and to be recommended!

The other bit of advice was also one for which I had good cause later to be grateful. West Indian matters were a little troublesome in 1921, partly owing to economic difficulties over sugar prices, and partly owing to the perennial demand from one or other of the colonies for constitutional advance. Churchill accordingly decided to send me round the islands and to Trinidad, to listen and report. Before I left, he asked me whether I had ever inspected a guard of honor. I had not—and he thereupon said, "There is only one thing that's important to remember. Look every man straight in the face as you pass him. The sergeant major has had them all standing on parade in a hot sun in time for at least two regimental officers to see them one after another before you come on the scene, and if you go by talking to whoever is with you and looking the other way, it's pretty flat for the men." I was often to profit by this advice later when I went to India.

It was after a Cabinet in early October, 1925, that Birkenhead, then Secretary of State for India, made the suggestion to me that I should succeed Lord Reading as viceroy when he retired in April, 1926. I was not aware at the time of what Mr. Harold Nicolson has stated in his Life of King George V, that it was the king who was responsible for putting the idea forward. Had I known that, I should perhaps have felt some hesitation in making my answer to Birkenhead's proposal, as I did, one of qualified refusal.

I told him that though naturally very sensible of the honor of having my name put forward for such a post, I felt that personal and family reasons were strong enough to justify me in asking him not to press it. My father was eighty-six, and it was scarcely to be expected that he would live till I had finished my five-year term; my three sons had either just gone or were just going to school, and I should be practically cutting myself off from them during five formative years. I did, however, add that should a situation arise in which, other possibilities having been explored and found impossible, he told me that it was my plain duty to set these private reasons aside, I should of course feel bound to reconsider the whole question.

After this we had one or two talks in which Birkenhead pressed the case for my acceptance. In the light of these I went up to Yorkshire to discuss the proposal with my father, which we did in all its aspects. It happened to be the morning of SS. Simon and Jude that I was with him, and we went together to church, thinking much about what the answer ought to be. When we came out, my father said, "I think you ought to go." I felt the same, and accordingly communicated in that sense with Birkenhead.

Formal farewell of the outgoing viceroy having been taken, I was duly sworn in. Dorothy attended this ceremony in the Convocation Hall, and thought it was exactly like being married again (the hall looking much like a church), the only difference being that she had to wait for me, instead of me waiting for her. And after many oaths had been taken and solemn papers signed, we left the building with something of the same feeling of constraint as after a wedding, wondering whether we ought to bow and smile to friends as we went down the "aisle" or not.

The journey to Delhi gave us our first experience of the viceregal train, which was most impressive, all painted white, with the viceroy's coat of arms on every coach, and with luxurious accommodation in the way of saloons, sleeping cabins and bathrooms. The train stopped for meals and baths, hot water being provided for these from big boilers at local stations. The line was guarded by men found from the different villages on the route, and at night everyone held a flaming torch, which looked garish and picturesque. The only drawback was dust, which seemed to defeat every effort to keep it out.

By this time it was warming up and we stopped only a day or two at Viceregal Lodge in Old Delhi, in the middle of its tented camp for staff and guests, before moving on to Dehra Dun en route to Simla. Each of these places was to play the part of home for us at varying times during the next five years.

At both Delhi and Simla, Dorothy and I always made a practice of breakfasting together and alone, which was often the only chance of picking up family threads, and seeing our youngest son, Richard, aged six or seven. While we were at Simla, he was to begin going to some little school there, which for some reason he was most reluctant to do. Every day he would announce to us with great solemnity and determination, "I am not going to the school."

We made no reply; and finally the day arrived when he actually was to go for the first time. The servant came in to say that the baba sahib's ricksha was at the door. I repeated this information to Richard and told him he had better not keep the men waiting. Then ensued a pause in dead silence, during which we looked at each other, while each weighed the odds and chances of battle. But finally, with no word said, Richard went and the bloodless skirmish was over.

Presently the time came when he was to return to England to begin regular school, and like all parents we were feeling a little sad at the passing of a stage of family life to which there is no return. One Sunday morning as we were driving to church in Old Delhi, I said something of this sort to Richard, suggesting that he, too, perhaps would be a little sorry to be going away. I ought to have known better and richly deserved the gentle answer that came back:

"Oh yes, I shall; but there are the white mice at Garrowby."

Distances in India are large; and if a viceroy was to hope to see what he ought during his five-year term, it meant much traveling. Sometimes it was like stepping onto a new planet, so complete was the transition in scene and outlook. A visit, for example, to Burma, such as we paid in 1928 to be the guests of Sir Charles and Lady Innes, introduced you the moment you set foot on Burmese soil to atmosphere lighthearted, fresh, colorful a gay, among the favored dwellers in a fer and well-watered land. In Mandalay you mig fancy that King Theebaw was only just rou the corner; and whatever might be the obs cles of geography the visitor felt that, if only went a little farther, he would soon fi himself in China.

In addition to all that there was to see a do in British India and Burma, it was not l the viceroy's duty, as it was always his desi to visit the Indian states. These visits were, far as might be, taken in an order correspor ing to their importance, and on the first visit any state conducted with a scrupulous rega for ceremonial and etiquette. The ruler, companied by members of his staff, paid a f mal call upon the viceroy, being received him at the precise spot consecrated by custo the actual point of meeting being measu and marked on the official carpet and reg lated according to the political stature of prince. The viceroy showed the prince to of two chairs, set formally and looking do the room between rows of other chairs either side, in which, facing each other, viceroy's staff and the ruler's staff respectiv took their places. A few minutes of rat stilted conversation followed between vice and prince, everybody else preserving dignif silence, after which attendants came in w many demonstrations of reverence, bring itr and pan and garlands, the traditional E ern symbols of respect and good will. T ritual concluded—and with minor local va tions it was always substantially the sam the visit terminated, the viceroy escorting prince out in the same way that he had him on arrival.

The return visit, when the prince recei the viceroy, was the exact duplicate of w had just taken place, with the roles of gu and host reversed. The whole proceedi rigid, artificial, and totally divorced as it from any semblance of vitality, was none less a curious example of how powerful in East can be the survival capacity that any dition draws through years of punctual unbroken observance.

It was on one of these southern tours we went to the new harbor on the Ma coast at Vizagapatam, where Congress sym thy was supposed to be strong. Our recept however, was friendly and I chuckled to s large streamer hung across the street bea the inscription "Long live the Viceroy with, on the reverse side, "God help L Irwin." [At that time, before his father's de Lord Halifax had been raised to the pee as Baron Irwin.]

Shortly after my Declaration of Octobe 1929, we had gone off on tour to the sou being arranged that we should move into Delhi on our return. A few miles outside station where we were to leave the train line ran along a high embankment, and at point a terrorist party had placed a bomb, the idea of touching it off from a distan the engine went over it, derailing the en down the embankment, the train being dra after it. But unluckily for the plan, the m ing was misty, the man responsible for se the bomb off misjudged either the exact or the pace of the train, with the result tha engine was over the piece of line to be bl out before the bomb exploded. The coaches negotiated the four-foot gap in o the rails without difficulty, and therefor yond a few of the servants' being cu broken glass, no harm was done.

New Delhi was a remarkable concep and buildings, layout of tanks and fount the broad sweep of Kingsway, and the Ir War Memorial, were fully worthy. The roy's House, with its grandeur and simp of detail, was always to my mind the mos isfying creation of all. The great enterta rooms were good, though they would been better if it had not been necessar ground of cost to cut down the size

AN EARLIER THRALLDOM

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

I have learned, as days fall
One upon one, as seasons swing,
To mourn dead fealty not at all,
To accept what pleasures freedom may bring,
To welcome possession of self again
(These hands are mine, not his, not his!),
To forget the bitter-broken chain—
But the blood has subtler loyalties.

That such instinctive anger burst
Though you but gently caught my wrist
Was not my wish. But he, first,
Captured the hand, captured and kissed,
And the pulse remembers, will not deny
An earlier thralldom, will not be free.
It was my blood that raged, not I, win Lutyens' original designs. The large rbar Hall, with its crimson hangings, the lroom decorated with black looking glass the walls; the great open loggias, overlook- the garden; the state dining room, with its g tables to seat a hundred and twenty, a ze of color with the scarlet and gold of the res of khidmatgars, the portraits of vice- s, and the gold plate presented by the Gold- iths' Company set out at the end of the om against a rich red velvet; and everything by lovely glass chandeliers: the general ef- t of all this could not have been better.
Against a lesser captivity.

In spite of its size, it was essentially a livable use; admiration and affection for it steadily ew together, and every day that we lived re we came to love it the more. There could ve been no better setting for it than the ogul garden, with the combination of its iental design of water and lawns and formal es with the riot of color from the best of estern flowers. Only when we returned to dia many years later were we able to appre- te the full glory of the creepers and the es, but even in its first beginnings it was a radise of which the enjoyment never waned. It was no ordinary moment when we actu- y moved in, after years of watching every- ng grow, and after the months of hard work t Dorothy and Alexandra Worsley had put o the furnishing and decoration of the house h Sir Edwin Lutyens and the chief engineer, Alexander Rouse. For the ceremonial open- a year later an elaborate program was nned, and great numbers of people gath- d, and we had a houseful of guests: repre- tatives from the dominions; Lord Hardinge, o had been responsible for the first plan- g; and of course the two architects, Sir win Lutyens and Sir Herbert Baker. Less n twenty years later the last British viceroy l left India.

et me come back to our first arrival in New lhi in 1929. While we had been away ar- gements had been going forward for a eting with the principal political leaders, l on the afternoon of the day that we got k they came to the Viceroy's House to dis- s my Declaration of October 31, 1929. Mr. ndhi and Pandit Motilal Nehru were there behalf of Congress; Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru; . Jinnah; and Mr. Patel, the president of the embly.

had a slight hope that the bomb incident t morning might have made them more table, but this hope was not realized and it very soon evident that the situation had led and hardened under the impact of the riendly debates in Parliament. Mr. Gandhi most of the talking on the text that unless British Government were willing to name early and precise date for the implementing he dominion-status assurance, the Work- Committee of the Congress at Lahore, to ch he and Motilal Nehru were then on their ', would almost certainly be obliged to de- e in favor of independence and back up r words by an active campaign of civil dis- dience. As they no doubt anticipated, I was ble to give them the kind of undertaking wanted, and they accordingly went off to ore to put their threats into execution.

o not recall any outstanding feature or t in this phase of the civil-disobedience ggle that has not been adequately treated he official records. It lasted for nearly a and was finally closed by the conversa- s that I had with Mr. Gandhi in February, 1, culminating in our agreement of March th. Apart from the conclusions reached, ch received full publicity at the time, these versations gave me an opportunity such as uld never otherwise have had, and for ch I shall always be thankful, of knowing Gandhi.

nce the tragedy of his assassination so h has been spoken and written of the qual- in him which seemed to the particular erver to be pre-eminent, that every country he world has become to a great extent fa- ar with this most remarkable human figs with all great men, different aspects d out for different people. That which gave his exceptional position in India was ething different from that which won for the admiration of friends in Western countries, which is another way of saying that the man himself was larger than any of the attempts made to paint his portrait. There was a directness about him which was singularly winning, but this could be accompanied by a subtlety of intellectual process which could sometimes be disconcerting. To appreciate what was passing in his mind it was necessary, if not to start from the same point, at least to understand very clearly what was the starting point for him, and this was nearly always very human and very simple.

I remember when I first went to India talking about him to C. F. Andrews, who, I imagine, was closer to him than any other European. He said, as indeed was clear when it came to the Round Table Conference, that Mr. Gandhi cared little for constitutions and constitutional forms. What he was concerned with was the human problem of how the Indian poor lived. Constitutional reform was important and necessary for the development of India's personality and self-respect; but what really mattered were the things that affected the daily lives of the millions of his fellow countrymen: salt, opium, cottage industries and the like.

I have no doubt this was true, and though it was easy to smile at the devotion of Mr. Gandhi to the spinning wheel, while Congress was largely dependent for its funds upon the generosity of wealthy Indian mill owners, the wheel nonetheless stood for something fundamental in his philosophy of life. He was the natural knight-errant, fighting always the battle of the weak against suffering and what he judged injustice.

As I look back upon the talks that I had with him in Delhi in the spring of 1931, two or three things in our conversations stand out in my recollection. They have always seemed to me a better interpretation of his mind and method than anything else, as showing the way that idealist and realist could meet. About the second day of our meeting, I asked him

They'll love you for thinking of this!

"Dennis always takes along 'Cream of Wheat' when he runs away from home!"

Pure golden honey on hot "Cream of Wheat." A wonderful way to take the chill off these chilly mornings. It's delicious. Try it!

GUARD YOUR FAMILY WITH HOT "CREAM OF WHEAT"

whether it would be agreeable to him if I asked Mr. Emerson, the Secretary in the Home Department, to sit in with us. I pointed out that he would know the answers to a good many of the detailed queries that Mr. Gandhi might be raising and that we should therefore get on more quickly than if I took notes and could get the answers for him only at a later meeting.

He quickly concurred, saying, "I shall be glad to meet Mr. Emerson. He must be a very cruel man to the poor people." This was because Emerson's signature as Home Secretary appeared on the various ordinances that I as governor general had been obliged to issue in connection with the campaign of civil disobedience. So Emerson duly sat in, and the contrast between the broad-shouldered, robust Briton and the small, fragile Mr. Gandhi was sharp.

Soon, however, confidence was established, and after Mr. Gandhi and I had been arguing about the working of some agreement we had reached, he would say, "I think we might leave this to Mr. Emerson. He is a very fair man." The Indian Civil Service can seldom have received a more signal or unexpected testimonial.

On another occasion he was demanding, as part of the arrangement to be made on the cessation of civil disobedience, an inquiry into the actions of the police over the last twelve months. I resisted this on various grounds, pointing out to him among other arguments that I had no doubt the police, like everybody else, had made mistakes, and I was very sorry about it, but that it was quite futile to attempt twelve months later to get accurate information of what might have passed in some local brawl or minor riot. Everybody would produce evidence in support of what he was setting out to prove; there would be no conceivable means of testing its accuracy; and all that we should achieve would be to exacerbate tempers on both sides.

This did not satisfy him at all, and we argued the point for two or three days. Finally I said that I would tell him the main reason why I could not give him what he wanted. I had no guaranty that he might not start civil disobedience again, and if and when he did, I wanted the police to have their tails up and not down. Whereupon his face lit up and he said, "Ah, now Your Excellency treats me the way General Smuts treated me in South Africa. You do not deny that I have an equitable claim, but you advance unanswerable reasons from the point of view of government why you cannot meet it. I drop the demand."

I may add one other recollection to the record of some dramatic days. A few hours after we had reached our agreement, he came back, rather depressed, saying that Jawaharlal Nehru was unhappy about it, and thought that he (Mr. Gandhi) had unwittingly sold India. I exhorted him not to let this worry him unduly, as I had no doubt that very soon I should be getting cables from England, telling me that in Churchill's opinion I had sold Great Britain. Such double criticism would suggest that what we had done was about right.

This cheered him, and so in fact it happened. The critics indeed were lonely voices, and both in India and Great Britain judgment was almost unanimous in the other sense. Dimly, inarticulately, unconsciously, the instinct of the British people was as usual guiding them wisely. Though they might not have been able to put it into words, they realized that the choice lay between power, which had served us well from the days of Clive, and influence, which, if we could use it aright in the changing conditions of the twentieth century, would serve us better. And they knew that, of the two, influence was the more securely founded and the more enduring.

After completing my time in India, it was good to get back to Yorkshire and to the opportunity of seeing friends. One of the most interesting happenings of that summer of 1932 was a celebration in Newcastle to commemorate the centenary of the passage of the Reform Bill and to do honor to the name of its principal sponsor, Lord Grey. The organizers of these doings kindly invited members of Lord Grey's family to take part, and in this fashion my father found himself once again at his beloved Howick.

We all went into Newcastle for dinner with the lord mayor before the meeting at which, among others, my father was to make a speech. This he did to a crowded hall with great success, telling about the politics of his childhood and of his memories of his grandfather, Lord Grey, at Howick with his dog, Pincher.

The following day we spent in satisfying idleness, sitting about at Dunstanborough Castle on the coast and looking at the long belt of gorse and rough cover which I believed to be the setting for Alan Northumberland's first-rate ghost story, The Shadow on the Moor.

Such contacts in country houses as the changing habits of the day still offered were by far the best means that a society with some opportunity for leisure had to offer for the making of new acquaintances or for the renewing of old ones. The inevitable disappearance under pressure of taxation and staff difficulties of the well-assorted weekend party in pleasant surroundings and with plenty of scope for easy conversation is a real impoverishment of one side of our social life. The perfect hostess was one who knew what people to bring together and, with unerring instinct, never made a mistake in entertaining too little or too much.

In such conditions the thirty-six hours out of London were a refreshment for body and soul alike. No visit fulfilled these requisites for the visitors more perfectly than those at Hatfield, where Lord and Lady Salisbury often allowed us to be their guests. I can think of nobody who can ever have been a better hostess than she was: gay, cheering everybody within reach of her with her infectious and captivating laughter, witty, wise, full of recollections of persons and things, putting everybody completely at their ease, never appearing to have a care in the world except to enjoy her guests and help them to enjoy themselves. Talk and argument among the different members of the family, from the youngest to the oldest, was unceasing and added much to the sum of general recreation. Lord Salisbury, Jem, might seem to those meeting him for the first time to be the least conspicuous of that remarkable group of Cecil brothers, of whom Lord Robert and Lord Hugh were the best known. To the outsider he might appear less dogmatic or self-assertive in conversation, but I have always understood that he had immense influence with them all, and I suppose fundamentally for the same reason that gave him his influence in public life. This was because everybody knew him to be a great Christian gentleman, in the best and largest sense of that word, and gave reverence to the example that he constantly and unconsciously set.

Cliveden was another hospitable house, where Lord and Lady Astor loved to assemble their friends. Waldorf and I had been together at Oxford, and until he succeeded his father we sat together in the House of Commons. The obligation of inheriting his father's peerage denied him, as it has denied others, the chance of making a political career in the House of Commons, and he persuaded J. H. Thomas, who was then Labour member for Derby, to bring in a bill under the ten-minutes rule, permitting him to surrender his peerage rights, so that he might continue in the Commons.

I had a good deal of sympathy with Waldorf Astor, but I also felt, as I still feel, that it was wrong for a constitutional provision of that sort to be made on an individual case, and that if anything was to be done about it, it ought to be as part of general legislation. I therefore moved the bill's rejection, which was duly carried, and Waldorf was debarred from the relief that he desired. So far as I knew, he never bore me any grudge for what I had done, which had the consequence of bringing Lady Astor into the House as the first woman member, and we remained friends as long as he lived.

We used to be asked to join a party at Cliveden from time to time, though not perhaps regularly enough to qualify for inclusion in the so-called "Cliveden Set." Who or what this legendary body was no one ever knew, and I believe that both it and its alleged corporate feeling of tenderness toward Nazi Germany were a pure invention of some journalistic brain. For, to judge only by those who were our fellow guests when we were there, the Cliveden visitors' book must have held a wonderful gallery of names. Of all political persuasions, of every profession and occupation, from Commonwealth countries, colonies and from most countries of the world: it is not easy to marshal so disconnected a collection into a "set."

Nancy Astor's mastery of the art of amusing her guests was unrivaled. There could never be a dull moment when she was within reach. Her sense of humor was untiring, and her histrionic gifts had supplied the perfect instrument by which she could both express and gratify it. Her vitality was inexhaustible; swimming, golf, tennis, talk through the daylight hours without prejudice to further talk and any other activity that might suggest itself after dinner, when night and day met. C tainly whatever else might be the reaction guests to this full ration of entertainment, th were not likely to be bored.

1934 was the year of my father's death. Eig years earlier, when he had been eighty-six, had gone over to Belgium in January twice ten days to see Cardinal Mercier before died and to attend his funeral. Since then had remained intellectually as alert as ev carried on a large daily correspondence and November, 1932, had got on a pony to see t foxhounds at Garrowby. When he died January, 1934, he was within a few months being ninety-five. For my sisters and mys his death was a very large element withdra from what had been our life.

He was buried at Hickleton, after a su Requiem in the little church, which was crowded that the only way in which we cou get people in was by taking out all the chai The church had remained his sheet anchor the end; every day he worshiped in it, a every year now on or about the anniversary his death a Requiem is sung for him there.

In those first years after we got back fro India he had encouraged me to do somethi which he had himself more than once do with great enjoyment. That was to spend week riding through some part of the count that one had not seen, staying at local inns a thinking of nothing more serious than wheth your pony was sound, or how the weather w likely to behave and how beautiful a pla England can be. Laying plans with Geoffr and Cecilia Dawson, we made expeditions gether through the Yorkshire dales and moors that divide them, reveling in the perf holiday. On one of our rides our party w augmented by Sonnie and Ivy Titchfield; a always we were accompanied by some of t young of our respective families.

It would be impossible to think of a mo perfect way of spending a few days, for anyo who loves the country and loves riding. I not think I ever enjoyed myself more. In th sort of country, particularly, you reap the ber fit of being out all day; for the lights a shadows on the large landscapes are changi constantly, and you miss none of them. Y must take pains beforehand to have the w reconnoitered, so as to avoid roads, and b speak accommodation for man and beast night; and it is often wise to secure local gui ing. But that is not at all difficult, and t actual trip more than repays any trou taken. As a method of ensuring complete r laxation and happiness, I can without any he tation recommend it.

My daughter, Anne, was already making f herself a reputation for riding well and be able to find her way efficiently across a cou try. Through her I recognized what no dou was a salutary correction of the balance of l and found myself able to boast a new title fame. I was riding along by myself whe heard this conversation proceeding behind between two members of the fox-hunti fraternity:

"Who's that in front there in hunting cap

"Oh, that's Lord Irwin, the Master of t Middleton."

"Irwin?"

"Yes; you know, was Viceroy of India last year."

"Viceroy of India? I've never heard of him

"Oh, you must know—Anne Wood's ther!"

In 1936 our eldest son married Ruth Pri rose, the daughter of Neil to whom I had on taught history at Oxford and the granddaug ter of Lord Rosebery and Lord Derby.

Almost at the same time as Charles' engag ment, Anne became engaged to Sim Fev sham, with whose father I had been at Chr Church and afterward in the House of Co mons. Both these marriages which took pla within a fortnight of each other in 1936 broug us great happiness which has grown with t years and for which we cannot be too thankf

Nothing—fortunately for all of us—qu takes the place of homemade soups. Mo over, they are inexpensive, appetizing ways using all manner of leftovers. POT-AU-FEU (BASIC BEEF STOCK)

Have your butcher give you 1½ pounds shinbones with marrow, cut into pieces, and 3½ pounds rump of beef or brisket in one piece. Place the bones and beef in a large kettle. Add 4½ quarts water and 1 tablespoon salt. Bring to a boil. Remove froth. Simmer for 2 hours. Add 3 carrots, halved, 3 white turnips, quartered, 1 yellow turnip, cut into pieces, 4 medium onions, each stuck with 1 clove, 3 celery stalks with leaves, a few sprigs parsley and 1 clove garlic, crushed. Season with 1 bay leaf and a pinch of thyme. Simmer for 2–2½ hours. Remove vegetables from broth. Strain through cheesecloth. Add salt and pepper to taste. Chill. Skim off fat. Reheat meat and vegetables in a little stock and drain. Serve meat on a hot platter with vegetables. Reheat rest of stock and pour into soup tureen. Garnish with lemon slices. Serve with French bread. Slice the meat thinly and serve with horse-radish. Makes 4 quarts soup.

EGG CHOY TONG

Place 1 cup cooked chicken, sliced thin, in a soup kettle with 7 cups chicken stock. Bring to a boil and simmer gently for 5 minutes. Add 1 quart finely chopped Chinese or regular cabbage. Season with 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate, salt and pepper to taste. Simmer all together for 3 to 4 minutes. Bring to a rapid boil. Beat 1 egg. Pass it through a fine sieve very gradually into the soup. Serve immediately. Makes about 2½ quarts.

A DE CEBOLLA CON TOMATOES

(Puerto Rican Onion-and-Tomato Soup)

Sauté 1½ cups finely chopped onion in 3 tablespoons butter until tender but not brown. Add 2 cups chopped peeled fresh tomatoes. Season with 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, a little freshly ground pepper, 1 bay leaf, crushed, and 1 teaspoon salt. Bring to a boil and simmer for 5 minutes. Add 6 cups chicken stock and simmer, covered, for 15 minutes more. Pour into a warmed soup tureen. Garnish the top with a sprinkling of chopped chives. In Puerto Rico bread cubes sautéed in a little butter are put into the soup dishes before filling. Makes about 2 quarts.

DDAR-CHEESE SOUP

In the top of a double boiler melt 2 tablespoons butter and blend in 2 tablespoons flour. Gradually stir in 3½ cups hot milk. Add 1 whole clove garlic and cook over simmering water for 20 minutes. Discard the garlic, stir in 2 tablespoons vinegar—or, if you like, a few tablespoons dry white wine—and 1 cup grated sharp Cheddar cheese. Season with ¾ teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon nutmeg and pepper to taste. Cook, stirring, until the cheese is melted. Beat 2 egg yolks with 2 tablespoons heavy cream. Add a little of the hot soup to the mixture and then mix all together in top of double boiler. Cook, stirring, for 3 minutes, but do not boil. Serve immediately. Makes 1 quart.

DIAN SPLIT-PEA SOUP

Soak 1 pound dried yellow split peas overnight in water to cover. For a quicker method, 1 hour before you wish to use them, place peas in a saucepan, cover with water and bring to a boil. Cover saucepan, remove from heat and allow peas to soak for 1 hour. Now that the peas are ready, sauté in a soup kettle ½ pound salt pork, diced, until crisp and browned. Remove the crisp pork and save till later. To the fat remaining in the kettle add ½ cup finely chopped onion and 2 cloves garlic, crushed. Sauté until golden. Drain the peas and add them to the kettle. Add 2 quarts water—or, if you happen to have it, tongue or ham stock—2 stalks celery with leaves and 1 leftover ham bone or a small smoked ham hock. Season with 1 bay leaf, crushed, 2 teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate and ½ teaspoon pepper. Simmer for 2 hours until peas are tender. Strain through a fine sieve. Reheat, thinning if necessary with a little hot water. If water instead of ham or tongue stock was used, you may need a little more salt for good flavor. Add diced pork and serve with croutons. Makes 9 cups.

Add ¼ cup crushed peppermint candy to cool Tapioca Cream.

newly cut crusty piece leaves little left to long for. I also like the smell of snow. It can't be compared to anything, for it is unlike anything else. It is deep and it is pure. And cleaner than crystal.

Jill is already planning on what to plant in the garden. As far as the main planting at Stillmeadow goes, we have already done too much. All those tiny switches we put out some years ago are giants now. The flowering quince is a jungle. The lilacs touch the rooftop. The grapevines just sat for a few years and made small meals for the Japanese beetles. Now it looks as if we meant to live in a vineyard.

The Tartarian honeysuckle is so immense that we burst into shouts of mirth when it blooms. And Jill makes a small tunnel in the pines to get to the kennel.

My advice to gardeners would always be, "Plant only half as much and twice as far apart." In the vegetable garden, we used to have crops enough for a hotel and we spent half the summer freezing and canning, pickling and making jelly. Only a few things don't load the shelves if you put them up. I once spent half a day making cucumber catchup and had five very small jars as a result. Three days—and nights—and gallons of maple sap resulted in four half-pint jars of maple sirup.

But Jill has learned that if you plant beans, you should think twice about the rows. For no matter how many hungry guests you have and how often hungry children come home for weekends and holidays, there is a limit to how many dozens of jars of frozen string beans can be consumed. And few people will enjoy two or three quarts of chili sauce a day.

Almost everyone loves sweet corn, and to b edible it has to be rushed from garden t house and instantly shucked and boile briefly, soused with butter, well peppered an salted and eaten. Jill's son once ate a doze ears for supper. But he is a busy doctor now and is not often around when the corn is in. S we reduced the corn planting because I ge tired of scraping ears every day for a week And freezing them.

One year I made about eighty jars of elder berry jelly. This is delicious, dark and not to sweet. Perfect with cold meat or hot roas pork or with cold duck. This year I mad eighteen glasses, and we shall have plenty.

Nobody likes change—at least few peopl do. I feel nostalgic for the days when the hous was bounding with small children, my one an Jill's two, and my main value in the world wa to fry doughnuts that could be eaten in stantly, still hot with the sugar on them. I mis the wrestling with snow suits and the thawin of mittens on the rack by the old wood stov

I miss the plaintive voices, two hours afte a big hot lunch: "Isn't it about time to hav supper?"

I miss the jackstraws and the BB gun tha shot holes in the barn window. Even the squab bling takes on glamour when you look bac at it, although it drove us distracted at th time.

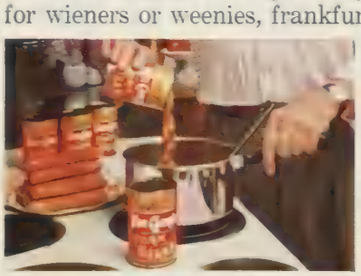
But looking at the new year from what is mature a viewpoint as I can achieve, I thin the most important thing in any woman's li is to accept the growing up of the childre gracefully. To adjust to change. Not to inte fere with the raising of the grandchildren. N to inflict old-fashioned ideas on the you adults. And to realize that middle age must old-fashioned.

I cannot live last year over again, I tell m self. Nor any other year that is gone. But t morrow holds a promise of something ne some worth-while work to accomplish. holds friendships to cherish, and alway things to learn.

The sun makes a glow on the snow in th yard. The prints of rabbit and junco and squi rel (who hogs the grain) and field mouse a delicately etched. Irish and cocker paws cov them over as the dogs race out.

The pines are silvered over. Snow clings t the north side of the giant sugar maples. (Th will need care in the spring.)

As I go out to fill the bird feeders, the chick adees scold me for lying in bed so long. Th juncos scurry around, neat as the man in th gray flannel suit. The Evening Grosbeak (who deserve capitals) argue from the lil bushes and shove one another around lik school children.



Shadows on the snow are as blue as the have always been. And as I carry the empt pans back to the house, I think this is a wo derful world.

The garden will be smaller, but we sha plant radishes before long, and the asparag will be up.

Any time of year can be a new year if think of it so.

Beans and___whatever you may call them—an inspiration! Just ask at your meat counter for wieners or weenies, frankfurters or franks, or plain hot dogs, it doesn't matter.

But be mighty particular to get only Van Camp's Pork and Beans. That's the one that makes the dish delish'! (It's that Secret Savory Sauce that does it.)

POACH THE WIENERS: Don't boil wieners or frankfurters . . . that makes them pop open. To heat them gently through-and-through, keep the water just under boiling. Then place or slice on top of Van Camp's Pork and Beans. Right proportions: 2 cans of beans to a wieners.

THE ARCHBISHOP'S DILEMMA

"No," said the count. "But I scarcely kn what to say to you. I am embarrassed."

"My son," said the cardinal, "when Frenchman is embarrassed he is truly pe tent. You may begin as abruptly as y choose. Are you a Catholic?"

"No," replied the count. "My family we Huguenots."

The cardinal shrugged his shoulders t least bit. "I never cease to admire your cou trymen," he said. "On Sundays they say, believe in the Holy Catholic Church,' and workdays they shout, 'Liberté, Egalité, Fr ternité!' You are admirably trained. Y adapt yourselves to circumstances."

"Yes," said the count, a trifle nettled, believe we do, but at present I find myself maladroit as though I had been born in t Western Hemisphere—in Mexico, for ample."

cardinal saw the blush and his anger shed. "Ah," he said softly, "there is a an, is there?"

Yes," replied the count, "there is a an."

Well," said the cardinal, "I am listening." t won't bore you?" asked the count. "If I n about her I shan't know when to stop."

My son," said the cardinal, "if there were women there would be no priests. Our pation would be gone. There was a time men built churches, beautified them and to them. How is it now; even here in San de Guaymas, where art still exists, and e there is no bourse? I was speaking a man only today—a man of affairs, one buys and sells, who has agents in foreign and ships on the seas; a man who in the eligious days would have given a tenth his goods to the church and would have d honor and contentment in the re- der; but he is bitten with this newfangled of disbelief. He kept straight rough the home-rule troubles, and he chipped in a lot for the Jubilee fund, and they made him Lord Dundass. He died two years ago and left one child. She is Lady Patricia O'Neill. She is waiting for me now at the Playa del Cortez."

"Perhaps I am detaining you?" said the cardinal.

"By no means," replied the count. "I don't dare go back just yet. I met her first on the Riviera last season. I've followed her about like a spaniel ever since. I started in for a lark, and now I'm in for keeps. She has a peculiar way with her," continued the count, smoothing his hat; "one minute you think you are great pals and the next you wonder if you have ever been presented."

"I recognize the Irish variety," said the cardinal.

"She is here with her yacht," continued the count. "Her aunt is with her. The aunt is a good sort. I am sure you would like her."

"Doubtless," said the cardinal, with a shrug; "but have you nothing more to say about the niece?"

"I followed her here," continued the count, his hands still busy with his hat, "and I've done my best. Just now, in the plaza, I asked her to marry me, and she laughed. We went into San Xavier, and the lights and the music and the pictures and the perfume of incense seemed to soften her. 'Did you mean it?' she said to me. I told her I did. 'Don't speak to me for a little while,' she said, 'I want to think.' That was strange, wasn't it?"

"No," said the cardinal, "I don't think that was strange. I think it was merely feminine."

"We came out of the church," continued the count, "and I felt sure of her; but when we came into the plaza and she saw the life of the place, the fountain playing, the banners flying, the pigeons wheeling, and heard the band, she began to laugh and chaff. 'Guy,' she said suddenly, 'did you mean it?'

"'Yes,' I said, 'I meant it.' She looked at me for a moment so fixedly that I began to think of the things I had done and which she had not done, of the gulf there was between us—you understand?"

"Yes," said the cardinal, "I understand—that is, I can imagine."

"And then," continued the count, "I ventured to look into her eyes, and she was laughing at me.

"'Guy,' she said, 'I believe I've landed you. I know you're a fortune hunter, but who cares? I dare say I should be one, but for the beer. I'm throwing myself away. With my fortune and my figure I think I could get a marquis or even an English duke. An elderly duke, perhaps, and a little over in the knees, but still a duke. A well-brought-up young woman would take the duke, but I am nothing but a wild Irish girl. Guy, you are gay and handsome, and auntie likes you, and I'll take you —— Hold hard,' she said as I moved up, 'I'll take you, if you'll give me the turquoise chalice.' 'What's that?' I asked. 'The exquisite turquoise chalice,' she said, 'the one in the treasury of San Xavier del Bac—it's even more beautiful than the medieval diamond monstrance, diamonds big as birds' eggs, in the Church of the Loretta in Prague. Give me the chalice and Patricia O'Neill is yours.' 'All right,' I said, 'I'll trot off and buy it.'

"Here I am, your grace, an impecunious but determined man. I have twenty thousand dollars at the American Express, all I have in the world; will that be enough to lift the chalice?"

The cardinal rubbed his white hands together, uncrossed and recrossed his legs, struck the arm of his chair, and burst into a laugh so merry and so prolonged that the count, perforce, joined him.

"It's funny," said the latter finally, "but all the same, it's serious."

"Oh, Love!" exclaimed the cardinal. "You little naked boy with wings and a bow! You give us more trouble than all the rest of the heathen deities combined: you fly about so; you appear in such strange places; you compel mortals to do such remarkable things; you debauch my pigeons; and, when the ill is done, you send your victims to me, or another priest, to ask for absolution, so that they may begin all over again."

"Do I get the chalice?" asked the count with some impatience.

"My son," said the cardinal, "if the chalice were mine, I have a fancy that I would give it to you, with my blessing and my best wishes; but when you ask me to sell it to you, it is as though you asked the Queen of England to sell you the Koh-i-noor. She dare not, if she could. She could not, if she dared. Both the diamond and the chalice were, doubtless, stolen. The diamond was taken in the last century; the chalice was looted so long ago that no one knows. A sad attribute of crime is that time softens it. There is a mental statute of limitations that converts possession into ownership. 'We stole the Koh-i-noor so long ago,' says the Englishman, 'that we own it now.' So it is with the cup. Where did it come from? It is doubtless Byzantine, but where did its maker live; in Byzantium or here, in Mexico? We used to kidnap Oriental artists in the good old days when art was a religion. This cup was made by one whom God befriended; by a brain steeped in the love of the beautiful; by a hand so cunning that when it died art languished; by a power so compelling that the treasuries of the world were opened to it. Its bowl is a turquoise, the size and shape of an ostrich's egg, sawn through its longer diameter, and resting on its side. Four gold arms clasp the bowl and meet under it. These arms are set with emeralds and rubies en cabochon, except one, which is cut in facets. The arms are welded beneath the bowl and form the stem. Midway of the stem, and pierced by it, is a diamond, as large"—the cardinal picked up his spoon—"yes," he said, "as large as the bowl of this teaspoon. The foot of the cup is an emerald, flat on the bottom and joined to the stem by a ferrule of transparent enamel. If this treasure were offered for sale, the wealth of the world would fight for it. No, no, my son, you cannot have the chalice. Take your twenty thousand dollars to Salvatierra, the jeweler, and buy a string of pearls. Very few good women can resist pearls and the Bay of Guaymas has produced the finest since time began."

"Your grace," said the count, rising, "I appreciate fully the absurdity of my errand and the kindness of your forbearance. I fear, however, that you scarcely grasp the situation. I am going to marry Lady Patricia. I cannot marry her without the chalice. You perceive the conclusion—I shall have the chalice. Good-by, your grace; I thank you for your patience."

"Good-by," said the cardinal, ringing for a servant. "I wish that I might serve you; but when children cry for the moon, what is to be done? Come and see me again; I am nearly always at home about this hour."

"I repeat, your grace," said the count, "that I shall have the chalice. All is fair in love and war, is it not?"

There was a certain quality in the count's voice—that quiet, even note of sincerity which quells riots, which quiets horses, which leads forlorn hopes—and the well-trained ear of the cardinal recognized it.

"Pedro," he said to the servant who answered the bell, "I am going out. My hat and stick. . . . I will go a little way with you, my son."

They went down the broad stairs together, and the count noticed, for the first time, that his companion limped.

"Gout?" he asked.

"No," said the cardinal; "the indiscretion of youth. I was with Pancho Villa and caught a bullet."

"Take my arm," said the count.

"Willingly," said the cardinal, "since I know that you will bring me into the presence of a woman worth seeing; a woman who can compel a count of France to meditate a theft."

"How do you know that?" exclaimed the count; and he stopped so abruptly that the cardinal put his free hand against his companion's breast to right himself.

"Because," said the cardinal, "I saw your face when you said good-by to me. It was not a pleasant face."

They went on silently and soon they came to the plaza.

"I don't see her," said the count; "perhaps she has gone back to the church."

They crossed the plaza and entered San Xavier del Bac.

"Not here," said the count.

They walked up the south aisle and came to the anteroom of the treasury. Its door was open. They entered what had once been a tower built by Father Kino and his Indians. The door of the treasury was also open. They went in and found the sacristan and a woman. She held the turquoise chalice in her hands.

"Did you buy it, Guy?" she exclaimed.

She turned and saw that the count was not alone.

"Your grace," he said, "I present you to Lady Patricia O'Neill."

She bent with a motion half genuflection, half curtsy, and then straightened herself, smiling.

The cardinal did not notice the obeisance, but he did notice the smile. It seemed to him, as he looked at her, that the treasures of San Xavier del Bac, the jeweled chalices and patens, the agate and crystal vessels, the reliquaries of gold and precious stones, the candlesticks, the two textus covers of golden cloisonné, and even the turquoise chalice itself, turned dull and wan and common by comparison with her beauty.

"Your eminence," she said, "you must pardon Guy's gaucherie. He presented you to me and called you 'your grace.' He forgot, or did not know, that you are a cardinal—a prince—and that I should have been presented to you. Guy means well, but he is a French count and a soldier, so we don't expect much else of Guy."

"He has done a very gracious thing today," said the cardinal. "He has brought me to you."

Lady Patricia looked up quickly, scenting a compliment, and ready to meet it, but the cardinal's face was so grave and so sincere that her readiness forsook her and she stood silent.

The count seemed to be interested in a crucifix of the eleventh century.

"While the count is occupied with the crucifix," said the cardinal, "will you not walk with me?"

"Willingly," said Lady Patricia, and they went out into the church.

"My dear lady," said the cardinal, after an interval of silence, "you are entering upon life. You have a position, you have wealth, you have health, and"—with a bow—"you have beauty such as God gives to His creatures only for good purposes. Some women, like Helen of Troy and Cleopatra, have used their beauty for evil. Others, like my empress, Isabella, and like Mary, Queen of the Scots,

JINX

Every spring, many varieties of birds come to the British Isles. Among the strangest visitors of earlier centuries was a harsh-voiced migrant somewhat larger than a sparrow. Everything about the bird was queer. Its plumage was curiously variegated—brown, buff, black and gray. It had an unusually long tongue. Most distinctive of all, the odd creature had a way of constantly twisting its head and neck awry.

From the latter trait, common folk called the bird "wryneck." All men of learning, however, used the Latin name, jynx torquilla—customarily abbreviated to the first name only. Because of its strange appearance and habits, the jynx was widely used in alchemy and witchcraft. When an ally of the devil wished to cast a spell on some foe, the wonderworker would brew a potion of which a jynx was a major ingredient. Firmly fixed in public opinion as a tool of ill luck, the harmless jinx eventually gave its name to any type of evil spell.

have held their beauty as a trust to be exploited for good, as a power to be exercised on the side of the powerless."

"Your eminence," said Lady Patricia, "we are now taught in England that Queen Mary was not altogether proper."

"She had beauty, had she not?" asked the cardinal.

"Yes," replied Lady Pat.

"She was beheaded, was she not?" asked the cardinal.

"Yes," said Lady Patricia, "and by a very plain woman."

"There you have it!" exclaimed the cardinal. "If Elizabeth had been beautiful and Mary plain, Mary would have kept her head. It is sad to see beautiful women lose their heads. It is sad to see you lose yours."

"Mine?" exclaimed Lady Patricia, and she put her hands up to her hair, as if to reassure herself.

"Yes," said the cardinal, "I fear that it is quite gone."

The Lady Patricia looked at him with questioning eyes. "Yes," she said, "I must have lost it, for I do not understand you, and I have not always been dull."

"My dear lady," said the cardinal, "the Count de Lubersac was good enough to pay me a visit this afternoon."

"Oh," exclaimed Lady Pat, clapping her hands, "if only I could have been behind the curtains! What did he say?"

"He said," replied the cardinal, "that he had asked you to be his wife."

"Indeed he has," said Lady Pat, "and so have others."

"He also said," continued the cardinal, "that you had promised to marry him when he brought you the turquoise chalice."

"And so I will," said Lady Pat.

"He proposed to buy the chalice," continued the cardinal. "He offered twenty thousand dollars, which, he said, was all he had in the world."

"Good old Guy!" exclaimed Lady Pat. "That was nice of him, wasn't it?" and her eyes glistened.

"Yes," said the cardinal, "that was nice of him; but when I explained how impossible it was to sell the chalice he bade me good-by, and, as he was going, said, 'I shall have it. All is fair in love and war.' I feared then that he meant to take the chalice. Since I have seen you I am certain of it."

"What a lark!" cried Lady Patricia. "Fancy Guy with a dark lantern, a bristly beard, and a red handkerchief about his neck. All burglars are like that, you know; and then fancy him creeping up the aisle with his johnnie—no, his jimmy—and his felt slippers—just fancy Guy in felt slippers—and he reaches the treasury door, and just then the moon comes up and shines through that window and illuminates the bird with outstretched wings on the hand of St. Francis, and Guy cries, 'An omen,' and he tries the lock and the door flies open, and Guy lifts the chalice, shuts the door, goes down the steps, across the plaza, down to the quay, puts the chalice in his teeth, takes a header into the sea and swims out to the yacht. When he comes alongside they hail him, and he comes up the ladder. 'Where's your mistress?' he asks, and they call me, and I come on deck in my pink negligee, and there stands Guy, the water running off him and the chalice in his teeth. 'There's your bauble,' he says. (Of course he takes the cup out of his mouth when he speaks.) 'And here's your Pat,' I say, and the boatswain pipes all hands aft to witness the marriage ceremony. No, no, your eminence"—she laughed—"it's too good to be true. Guy will never steal the chalice. He has never done anything in all his life but walk down the Champs Élysées. He's a darling, but he is not energetic."

"You are doubtless right," said the cardinal, "and my fears are but the timidity of age; still ——"

The count joined them. He had just given the sacristan fifty dollars, and had endeavored to treat the gift as a disinterested pourboire. He felt that he had failed; that he had overdone it, and had made himself a marked man. The sacristan followed him—voluble, eulogistic.

"Tomás," said the cardinal, "this is the Count de Lubersac. He is to have every privilege, every liberty. He is to be left alone if he desires it. He is not to be bothered with attendance or suggestions. He may use a camera; he may handle anything in the treasury. You will regard him as though he were myself."

Tomás bowed low. The count blushed.

Lady Patricia looked at her watch. "Five o'clock!" she exclaimed. "And Aunt Molly will be wanting her tea. The launch is at the stairs. Will you come, Guy? And you, your eminence, will you honor me?"

"Not today, my lady," replied the cardinal, "but perhaps some other time."

"Tomorrow?" she asked.

"Yes," said the cardinal.

"Thank you," said Lady Patricia; "the launch will be at the landing at half past four."

"Is it a motorboat?" asked the cardinal with a smile.

"Yes," replied Lady Patricia.

"Then," said the cardinal, "you need not send it. I will come in my barquito. Gasoline and the church are not friendly. We have only just become reconciled to steam."

Lady Patricia laughed. "Good-by," she said, "until tomorrow," and again she made her curtsy.

NEXT MONTH

Caroline had come down from London for a quiet visit in the country—only to find herself involved in the frightful web of murder. She did not realize that she herself was in danger, but she unwittingly held the perilous knowledge which could identify the murderer. She did recognize another danger, however—the danger of falling in love with gray-eyed Inspector Avery Freeland, who was working to find the murderer and save Caroline's life.

"Until tomorrow," said the cardinal; and he watched them down the aisle.

"Tomás," he said to the sacristan, "give me the turquoise chalice."

Tomás handed it to him.

"Now lock the door," said the cardinal, "and give me the key."

Tomás complied.

The cardinal put the chalice under his robe and started down the aisle. "Tomás," he said, "you are now closed for the annual cleaning. You understand, do you not?"

"Perfectly, your eminence," replied Tomás, and then he added, "When a stranger gives me more than six hundred pesos it is time to lock my door."

The cardinal went out of the church, the turquoise chalice under his cassock. He crossed the plaza slowly, for he was both limping and thinking. He came to the shop of Salvatierra, the jeweler, under the arcade, paused a moment, and entered. The clerks behind the counters sprang to their feet and bowed low. "Señor Salvatierra?" asked the cardinal. "Is he within?"

"Yes, your eminence," said the head clerk. "He is in his bureau. I will summon him."

"No," said the cardinal. "If he is alone I will go in," and he opened the door at the back of the shop and closed it behind him. In ten minutes he came out again. Señor Salvatierra followed, rubbing his hands and bowing at each step.

"Perfectly, your eminence," he said. "I quite understand."

"It must be in my hands in ten days," said the cardinal.

"Ten days!" exclaimed Salvatierra. "Impossible."

"What is that strange word?" said the cardinal. "It must be a vulgarism of the new Mexico, that 'impossible.' I do not like it and I will thank you not to use it again when speaking to me. In ten days, señor."

"Yes, your eminence," said Salvatierra, "but it will be in the afternoon."

"In ten days," said the cardinal very quietly.

"Yes, your eminence," said Salvatierra.

"He looks like Napoleon," whispered the head clerk to his neighbor.

The cardinal went limping down the shop. He had almost reached the door when he stopped and spoke to a little man who stood behind the showcase in which were the enamels.

"Ah, señor!" he exclaimed. "How come on the wife and baby? I meant to see them this afternoon, but I was diverted. I wish you to continue the same diet for them—take this"—and he fumbled in his pocket, but drew a blank. "Señor Salvatierra," he said to the master at his heels, "I find I have no money. Kindly loan me fifty pesos. Here," he said to the little man and he slipped the money into his hand, "plenty of milk for the child"; and he went out of the shop.

"That was not like Napoleon," said the head clerk; and then he added, "Occasionally one meets with a priest who rises superior to his profession."

The little man behind the enamel counter said nothing, but he drew his hand across his eyes.

The following day was a busy one for the cardinal. While Pedro was shaving him he parceled out the hours.

"What time is it, Pedro?" he asked.

"Three minutes past seven, your eminence."

"Good," said the cardinal; "at half past I make my Mass; at eight, I take my coffee; from eight to ten, my poor —— By the way, Pedro, is there any money in the house?"

"Yes, your eminence," said Pedro; "there are eight hundred pesos in your desk."

"Take fifty of them to Señor Salvatierra in the plaza, with my thanks," said the cardinal, "and put the rest in my purse. . . . Where was I, Pedro?"

"Your eminence had reached ten o'clock," replied Pedro.

"From ten to eleven," continued the cardinal, "audience for the laity; from eleven to half past, audience for the clergy; half past eleven, my egg and a salad. Keep all who look hungry, Pedro, and ask them to take déjeuner with me. At twelve, see the architect who is repairing the altar rail at St. Augustine's; take time to write to the superior at Hermosillo in reference to the proof sheets of the Life of Eusebius; from one to three, my poor—we must get some more money, Pedro; from three to four ——"

"There, your eminence!" exclaimed Pedro. "I have cut you."

"Yes," said the cardinal, "I was about to mention it. Where was I?"

"Your eminence was at four o'clock," replied Pedro.

"Four o'clock already," exclaimed the cardinal, "and nothing done! From four to half past four, interview with the treasurer of the diocese. That's a bad half hour, Pedro. At half past four I wish the barquito to be at the landing. I am to visit the English yacht that lies out in the bay. You must dress me in my best today."

"Alas, your eminence," said Pedro, "your best cassock is two years old."

"How old is the one I wore yesterday?" asked the cardinal.

"Four years at least," said Pedro. "You have your ceremonial dress, but nothing better for the street."

"I caught a glimpse of myself in one of Salvatierra's mirrors yesterday," said the cardinal, "and I thought I looked rather well."

"Your eminence," said Pedro, "you saw your face and not your coat."

"Pedro," said the cardinal, rising, "you should have turned your hand to diplomacy; you would have gone far."

At half past four o'clock the cardinal's barquito drew up to the muelle. The oarsman was dressed in black, save that his sash and stockings were scarlet. It was as if a footman stepped off the box of a brougham and w on the curb. While the figures on the tower were still striking the half hour cardinal came limping across the plaza marineros at the muelle straightened t selves and stood respectfully erect as cardinal passed between them, looking man in the face. He beckoned to one left the ranks and came up to him, awk and sheepish.

"Amando," said the cardinal, "I hav ranged your matter. You are to pay ten a week, and are to keep out of the wines Mind, now, no drinking." To anothe said, "I have looked into your case, P You are perfectly right. I have empl counsel for you. Attend to your busines forget your trouble. When they arrived they found the dressed in flags from stem to stern; Patricia stood on the platform of the boa stairs, and the crew were mustered amid "Your eminence," cried Lady Pa "you should have a salute if I kne proper number of guns."

"My dear lady," said the cardinal, off his hat, "the church militant does no gunpowder, it fights hand to hand. . . . for me at six," he said to his remero.

"Surely," said Lady Patricia, "you wi with us. We have ices with the papal c and we have a little box for Peter's pen be passed with the coffee. I shall be muc appointed if you do not dine with us."

"Wait!" called the cardinal to his bar The oarsman put about. "Tell Pedro said, "to feed the pigeons as usual. Te to lay crumbs on the balcony railing, the cock bird is too greedy, to drive him and give the hen an opportunity. Com me at nine."

"Thank you," said Lady Patricia. poor are now provided for."

"Alas, no," said the cardinal. "My p are my aristocratic acquaintances. They leave me if I did not feed them. My rea have two legs, like the pigeons, but Go them no feathers. They are the misbeg the maladroit, the unlucky—and I sta that word—the halt, the blind, those consciences too tender to make their reduced gentlefolk, those who have give lives for the public good and are no gotten—all these are my poor, and they me by their acquaintance. "Will money help?" asked Lady P "I have a balance at my banker's."

"No, no, my lady," said the car "money can no more buy off poverty can buy off the bubonic plague. Bo diseases. God sent them and He alon abate them. At His next coming there strange sights. Some princes and some men will be astonished."

"County Clare!" exclaimed the cardinal. "Then you know Ennis? Fifty odd years ago there was a house just outside of the town of Ennis, with iron gates and a porter's lodge. The Blakes lived there."

"I was born in that house," said Miss O'Kelly. "It was drafty, but it always held a warm welcome."

"I do not remember the draft," said the cardinal, "but I do remember the welcome. When I was an undergraduate at Oxford, I made a tour of Ireland, during a long vacation. I had letters from Rome. One of them was to the chapter at Ennis. A young priest took me to that house. I went back several times. There were a daughter and several strapping sons. The boys did nothing, that I could discover, but hunt and shoot. They were amiable, however. The daughter hunted, also, but she did many other things. She kept the house, she visited the poor, she sang Irish songs to perfection, and she flirted beyond compare. She had hair so black that I can give you no notion of its sheen; and eyes as blue as our Sonoran skies. Her name was Patricia Blake. She was the most beautiful woman I had ever seen—until yesterday."

"She was my mother!" exclaimed Miss O'Kelly.

"And my grandmother," said Lady Patricia.

The cardinal drew a breath so sharp that it was almost a sob, then he shook Lady Patricia's hand.

"My child," he said, "I am an old man. I am three score years and ten, and then six more, and you bring back to me the happiest days of my youth. You are the image of Patricia Blake—yes, her very image. I kiss the images of saints every day," he added, "why not this one?" and he bent and kissed Lady Patricia's hand.

There was so much solemnity in the act that an awkward pause might have followed it had not Miss O'Kelly been Irish.

"Your imminence," she said, "since you've told us your age, I'll tell you mine. I'm two and twenty and I'm mighty tired of standin'. Let's go aft and have our tay."

They had taken but a few steps when Lady Patricia, noticing the cardinal's limp, drew his arm through her own and supported him.

"I know the whole story," she whispered. "You loved my grandmother."

"Yes," said the cardinal, "but I was unworthy."

They had their tea, two white-clad stewards serving them. The cardinal took a second cup and then rose and went to the side. He crumbled a biscuit along the rail.

"I have often wondered," he said, "if my pigeons come for me or my crumbs. Patricia Blake used to say that her poor were as glad to see her without a basket as with one. But she was a saint. She saw things more clearly than it is given to us to see them."

The women looked at each other in silence.

"No," said the cardinal, after an interval, "they do not come; they are as satisfied with Pedro's crumbs as with mine. Love is not a matter of the stomach"; and he brushed the crumbs overboard. "Perhaps the fishes will get them," he added, "and they will not know whence they came. Anonymous charity," he continued, coming back to his chair, "is the best. It curbs the pride of the giver and preserves the pride of the recipient. Open giving is becoming a trade. It is an American invention. Very rich men in that country offer so much for an object—a college, a hospital, a library—if someone else will give so much. The offer is printed in the newspapers of the land and its originator reaps much . . . what is the word I wish?—acclaim? no; kudos? no; ah yes, advertisement; that is the word. Thank God that charity does not thus masquerade in Mexico. There are men here, in poor old Guaymas, who give half their goods to feed the poor. Are their names published? No. The newspapers reason thus—'Here is a gentleman; let us treat him as one.' We have no professional philanthropists in Mexico. After all," he added, "mere giving is the lowest form of charity. If all the wealth of the world were divided, the world would be debauched. Binding up wounds, pouring in oil and wine, bringing the wronged man to an inn, giving him your companionship, your sympathy, so that he shows his heart to you and lets you heal its bruises—that is your true charity."

"That's what I'm telling Pat," exclaimed Miss O'Kelly. "She's forever drawing checks. There was my nephew, Pat's cousin, Phelim. He gave away all he had. He gave it to the piquet players in the Kildare Club. 'Aunt Molly,' he said to me, 'piquet has cost me fifteen thousand pounds, and I am just beginning to learn the game. Now that I know it a bit, no one will play with me. Your bread cast on the waters may come back, but it's ten to one it comes back moldy, from the voyage.' Phelim is the flower of the family, your imminence. He is six foot three. He was out twice before he was two and twenty. The first time was with Liftennant Doyle of the Enniskillens. 'Twas about a slip of a girl that they both fancied. The liftennant fired at the word and missed. 'Try your second barrel,' called Phelim, 'I'm still within bounds.' (That's pigeon-shootin' talk, your imminence.) The liftennant laughed and the two went off to the club, arm in arm, and they stayed there two days. There's waiters in the club yet that remembers it. The next time Phelim was out, 'twas with a little attorneyman from Cork, named Crawford. There was no girl this time; 'twas more serious; 'twas about a horse Phelim had sold, and the little attorneyman had served a writ, and Phelim went down to Cork and pulled the little man's nose. Whin the word was given the attorneyman fired and nicked Phelim's ear. Phelim raised his pistol, slow as married life, and covered the little man. 'Take off your hat,' yelled Phelim. The little man obeyed, white as a paper, and shakin' like a leaf. 'Was the horse sound?' called Phelim. 'He was,' said the little man. 'Was he six years old?' called Phelim. 'At least,' said the little man. 'None of your quibbles,' called Phelim. 'He was six, to a minute,' said the little man, looking into the pistol. 'Was he chape at the price?' asked Phelim. 'He was a gift,' said the attorney. 'Gentlemen,' says Phelim, 'you have heard this dyin' confession—we will now seal it,' and he sent a bullet through the attorney-man's hat. I had it all from Doctor Clancey, who was out with them. They sent Phelim to Parliament after that, but he took the Chiltern Hundreds and came home. He said his duties interfered with the snipe shootin'. You'd like Phelim, your imminence."

There are more people who wish to be loved than there are willing to love. CHAMFORT

"I am sure I should," said the cardinal.

"He's in love with Patricia," said Miss O'Kelly.

"Ah," said the cardinal, "I spoke too quickly."

Meanwhile the shadows began to creep across the deck. The cardinal rose from his chair. "At what hour do you dine?" he asked.

"I made the hour early when I heard you order your barquito for nine," said Lady Patricia; "I said half past seven."

"Then," said the cardinal, "I should excuse you, but I do it reluctantly. I am keeping you from your toilette."

Miss O'Kelly laughed. "Your imminence," she said, "when a woman reaches my age it takes her some time to dress. I told you I was two and twenty. It will take my maid nearly an hour to make me look it," and, with a curtsy, she went below.

Lady Patricia stayed behind. "Your eminence," she said, "the evening will be fine; shall we dine on deck?"

"That will be charming," said the cardinal.

"Whenever you wish to go to your room," said Lady Patricia, "you have but to press this button, and the head steward will come." She still loitered. "I think it very likely," she said, hesitating, "that the Count de Lubersac will drop in; he often does. I should have mentioned it before, but I was so delighted at your staying that I forgot all about him."

"My dear lady," said the cardinal, "to supplant the Count de Lubersac in your thoughts is great honor."

She looked at him quickly, blushed, cast down her eyes, and began, nervously, to play with a gold boat whistle that hung at her belt. When she had exhausted the possibilities of the whistle she looked up again, and the cardinal saw that there were tears upon her cheeks. When she knew that he had seen them, she disregarded them, and threw back her head proudly.

"Yes," she said, "I think of him far too often; so often that it makes me angry—it makes me ashamed. He is a count; he is tall and straight and beautiful and clean, and—he loves me—I know it," she exclaimed, her face illumined. "But why," she went on, "should I give myself to him on these terms? Why should he not earn me? Why does he compel me to so one-sided a bargain? I, too, am tall and straight and clean, and ill-favored, and, in addition, I have that curse of unmarried women—I have money. Why does he not do something to even up the transaction? Why does he not write a poem that someone will read? Why does he not write a song that someone will sing? Why does he not do something that will make the world call me his wife, instead of calling me my husband? The other day, when he knew I love were tugging at me, I told him I would marry him if he brought me the turquoise chalice. It was an idle thing to say, but why I say I stand by. I shall never marry him unless he brings it to me. You know us Irishwomen. We have our hearts to contend with, but we keep our word. I set my lord a trivial task—if he really wants me, he will accomplish it—I am not dear at the price."

"With true love," said the cardinal, "I do not think there is any question of price. It is an absolute surrender without terms. I speak this guardedly, for I am no expert as to the thing called human love. I recognize that it is the power that moves the world, but, in more than fifty years, I have tried to forget the world."

"Yes," cried Lady Patricia, "and, but for a cruel mistake, you would have married my grandmother."

"Yes," said the cardinal, "but for a cruel mistake."

"The mistake was hers!"

The cardinal threw up his hands. "It was a mistake," he said, "and it was buried many years ago. Why dig it up?"

"Forgive me," said Lady Patricia, and she started toward the hatch.

"My child," said the cardinal, "you know that you will not marry the count unless he brings you the chalice. Do you hope that he will bring it?"

She looked at him a moment, the red and white roses warring in her cheeks. "Yes," she said, "I hope it, for I love him," and she hid her hands to her face and ran below.

"If the count is the man I take him to be," said the cardinal to himself, "I fear that I am about to shut my eyes to a felony," and he pressed the electric button at his side. The head steward appeared so quickly that he overheard the cardinal say, "I certainly should have done it, at his age."

At six bells there was a tap on the cardinal's door. "Come in," he said.

The head steward entered. He had changed the white duck of the afternoon to the black of evening. He was now the major domo. He wore silk stockings and about his neck was a silver chain, and at the end of the chain hung a key.

"Your eminence's servant has come aboard," he said.

"Pedro?" asked the cardinal.

"I do not know his name," said the steward, "but he is most anxious to see your eminence."

"Let him come in at once," said the cardinal.

The steward backed out, bowing.

There was a loud knock upon the door. "Enter," said the cardinal.

Pedro came in. He carried a portmanteau.

"What is it?" exclaimed the cardinal. "Is anyone dying? Am I needed?"

"No, your eminence," said Pedro, "the public health is unusually good. I have come to dress you for dinner with the English."

"They are not English," said the cardinal; ey are Irish."

"In that event," said Pedro, "you will do as are."

"No," laughed the cardinal. "Since you e brought my finery I will put it on."

Pedro opened the portmanteau with a sigh. thought they were English," he said. "The h are as poor as the Mexicans. If I dress r eminence as I had intended, they will not reciate it."

"Do not fear," said the cardinal. "Do your t."

At seven bells there was another knock at cardinal's door. Pedro opened it. "Shall ner be served, your eminence?" asked the d steward.

"Whenever the ladies are ready," replied the dinal.

"They are already on deck, your eminence."

"At once, then," said the cardinal, and he t up the companionway, leaning on ro's arm.

The afterdeck was lighted by scores of in- descent lamps, each shaded by a scarlet en flower. The table stood, white and cool, tering with silver and crystal. In its center a golden vase, and in the vase were four let roses. The deck was covered with a let carpet, a strip of which ran forward to galley hatch, so that the service might be seless.

Lady Patricia was dressed in white and wore ewels. Miss O'Kelly was partially clad in a caded gown, cut as low as even the indis- ion of age permits. A necklace of huge ow topazes emphasized the space they d to cover.

The cardinal came into the glow of the ts. His cassock was black, but its hem, its ons and the pipings of its seams were let; so were his stockings; so was the d silk sash that circled his waist; so were silk gloves, thrust under the sash; so was birettina, the little skullcap that barely ered his crown and left to view a fringe of te hair and the rebellious lock upon his head. The lace at his wrists was point de ice. His pectoral cross was an antique that ld grace the Louvre. Of amethysts and e sapphires set in ancient silver, the coro- on the top of emeralds, and centered by a miniature of Christ on the crucifix, doubt- one of the first pieces of Limoges ever ioned. Pedro had indeed done his work

The cardinal smiled. "Lady Patricia," he "Ireland is the home of the fairies. When s there I heard much of them. Early in the ning I saw rings in the dew-laden grass was told that they had been made by the e people,' dancing. You evidently have ht a fairy prince and he does your bid- . Within an hour you have converted the deck into fairyland; you have ——"

st then, out of the blue darkness that lay een the yacht and Guaymas, burst the s of a small motorboat. They darted gside, and a moment after the Count de rsac came down the deck.

"Observe at once," whispered Lady Patricia to major-domo. "Pardon me, your emi- e," she said, "you were saying ——"

"I was merely remarking," said the cardinal, t you seem to have a fairy prince to do bidding. It seems that I was right. Here e."

dy Patricia smiled. "What kept you, ?" she said. "A business engagement, or you fall asleep?"

"Neither," said the count; "I lost a shirt "

"Your eminence is served," said the major- o.

They stood while the cardinal said grace, at conclusion of which all except the count ed themselves.

"Was it a valuable jewel, Guy?" asked Miss lly, in an interval of her soup.

"No," said the count; "a poor thing, but own."

"How did it happen?" asked Miss O'Kelly. your man stale it?"

"Dear, no," said the count; "it happened I was putting on my shirt."

Miss O'Kelly blushed, mentally, and raised apkin to her face.

"It twisted out of my fingers," continued the count, "and rolled away, somewhere. I moved every piece of furniture in the room; I got down on all fours and squinted along the floor; I went to the dressing table to look for another; my man, after putting out my things, had locked up everything and gone to his dinner. I couldn't dine with you, like freedom 'with my bosom bare' ——"

"No," said Miss O'Kelly, glancing down at her topazes, "you couldn't do that."

"Certainly not," said the count. "And so I put on my coat and went out to Salvatierra's in the plaza, and bought a stud. I was lucky to find them open, for it was past closing time. They told me they were working late on a hurry order. I put the stud in my shirt, raced across to the muelle, jumped into a motorboat, and here I am. Am I forgiven?"

"Yes," said Lady Patricia; "you were only five minutes late and your excuse is, at the least, ingenious. You could not have come unadorned."

"Unadorned!" exclaimed the count. "It was a question of coming unfastened."

Pedro began to refill the cardinal's glass, but his master stopped him. Pedro bent and whispered.

The cardinal laughed. "Pedro tells me," he said, "that this is better wine than that which I get at home and that I should make the most of it. The only difference that I remark in wines is that some are red and some are white."

"That reminds me of one night when Father Flynn dropped in to dine," said Miss O'Kelly— "'twas he had the wooden leg, you remember, Pat dear—and he and Phelim sat so late that I wint in with fresh candles. 'I call that good whisky,' says the father as I came in. 'Good whisky!' exclaimed Phelim. 'Did you ever see any whisky that was bad?' 'Now that you mintion it,' says his rivirence, 'I never did; but I've seen some that was scarce.' 'Another bottle, Aunt Molly,' says Phelim, 'his rivirence has a hollow leg.' When I came back with the bottle they were talking to a little wild gossoon from the hills. He was bareheaded, barefooted, and only one suspinder was between him and the police. 'Is your mother bad?' asked his rivirence. 'Dochtor says she'll die afore mornin',' says the gossoon. 'Will you lind me a horse, Phelim?' asks his rivirence. 'You ride a horse, with that leg!' says Phelim. 'No, I'll drive you in the cart'; and he went off to the stables. In five minutes he came back with the dogcart and the gray mare. His rivirence got up with the aid of a chair, the little gossoon climbed up behind, and the gravel flew as the gray mare started. They wint a matter of ten rods and then I saw the lamps again. They had turned, and they stopped before the porch—the gray mare on her haunches. 'Phelim,' I says, 'what ails you, you've a light hand when you're sober.' His rivirence leaned over and whispered, 'The oil cruet, Miss Molly, and don't let the gossoon see it.' I wint in, came out with the cruet in a paper, and handed it to him. 'All right, Phelim,' he says, and the gray mare started. At six in the mornin' I heard the gravel crunch, and I wint to the door. There stood the gray mare, her head down, and her tail bobbin'. 'You've overdriven her, Phelim,' says I. 'Perhaps,' says he, 'but I knew you were sittin' up for me. The curse of Ireland,' says he, 'is that her women sit up for her men.' 'How is the poor woman?' says I. 'She's dead,' says Phelim; 'Father Flynn is waiting for the neighbors to come.' 'And the little gossoon?' says I. Phelim leaned down from the dogcart; 'Aunt Molly,' says he, 'we can't afford to keep what we already have, can we?' 'No,' says I. 'Thin,' says Phelim, 'we can just as well afford to keep one more; so I told him to come to us, after the funeral.'"

"I don't quite follow that reasoning," said the count.

"I am more sure than ever that I should like Phelim," said the cardinal. "Why do you not have him on?"

"He's six foot three," explained Miss O'Kelly; "the yacht wouldn't fit him. He couldn't stand up, below. There is six foot seven below decks, but the electric lights project four inches. Then the beds—there isn't one more than six foot six. We had Phelim on board and tried him. He stayed one night.

'Aunt Molly,' he said in the morning, 'Pat has a beautiful boat, plenty of towels and a good cook. I should like to go with you, but I'm scared. I kept awake last night, with my knees drawn up, and all went well, but if ever I fall asleep, and straighten out, I'll kick the rudder out of her.' We couldn't have Phelim aboard, your imminence; he'd cancel the marine insurance."

While Miss O'Kelly had been running on, the cardinal had been politely listening. He had also been discreetly observing. He had the attributes of politicians and ecclesiastics—he could exercise all his senses together. While he was smiling at Miss O'Kelly he had seen Lady Patricia take from the gold vase one of the scarlet roses, press it, for an instant, to her lips and then, under cover of the table, pass it to the count. He had seen the count slowly lift the rose to his face, feigning to scent it while he kissed it. He had seen quick glances, quivering lips that half whispered, half kissed; he had seen the wireless telegraphy of love flashing messages which youth thinks are in cipher, known only to the sender and the recipient; and he, while laughing, had tapped the wire, and read the correspondence.

It is all over, he said to himself. They are in love. The little naked boy with the bow has hit them both.

Promptly at nine, Pedro announced the barquito. The cardinal made his adieus. "My son," he said to the count, "if you are for the shore, I should be honored by your company."

"Thank you," said the count, "but I ordered my motorboat at ten."

Lady Patricia and the count stood watching the cardinal's lantern as it sped toward Guaymas. It was soon lost in the night. Lady Patricia's hand rested upon the rail. The count covered it with his own. She did not move.

"Have you brought the chalice, Guy?" she asked.

"Not yet," he answered, "but I shall have it. The treasury is closed for the annual cleaning."

"When you bring it," she said, "you will find me here. I should like you to give it to me on the Tara. There is your motorboat light. Aunt Molly seems to be asleep in her chair. You need not wake her to say good night."

"I shan't," said the count.

Her hand still rested upon the rail—his hand still covered hers. She was gazing across the harbor at the countless lights of San José de Guaymas. The warm night breeze from the lagoon dimpled the water of the harbor until the reflected lights began to tremble. There was no sound save the tinkle of the water against the side, and the faint sound of a violin in the distance.

"Guy," said Lady Patricia finally, "it is nice to be here, just you and I."

He made a quick motion to take her in his arms, but she started back.

"No, no," she said, "not yet; not till you earn me. There may be many a slip twixt the cup and ——" She put her fingers to her lips.

Miss O'Kelly's chin fell so sharply upon her topazes that she wakened with a start. "Pat darlin'?" she cried, looking about her.

"Here I am," said Lady Patricia, coming into the light.

"Ah," said her aunt, "and Count Guy too. I thought he had gone. I must have had forty winks."

"I was only waiting," said the count, "to bid you good night."

"An Irishman," said Miss O'Kelly, "would have taken advantage of me slumbers, and would have kissed me hand."

"A Frenchman will do it when you are awake," said the count.

"That's nice," said Miss O'Kelly. "Run away home now, and get your beauty sleep."

During the following week the cardinal was so occupied with his poor that he nearly forgot his rich. He saw the yacht whenever he took his barquito at the muelle, and once when he was crossing the plaza he caught a glimpse of Lady Patricia and her aunt, window-shopping in the arcade.

As for the count, he haunted San Xavier del Bac. Many times each day he went to the treasury, only to find it locked. The sacristan could give him no comfort. "Perhaps tomorrow, excellency," he would say when the count put his customary question; "it is the annual cleaning, and sometimes a jewel needs resetting, an embroidery to be repaired—all this takes time—perhaps tomorrow. Shall I uncover the golden Virgin of Guadalupe, your excellency, or light up the alabaster column? They are both very fine," and the count would turn on his heel and leave the church, only to come back in an hour to repeat the question and receive the same answer.

One day the count spoke out. "Tomás," he said, "you are not a rich man, I take it?"

"Your excellency," replied Tomás, "I am inordinately poor. Are you about to tempt me?"

The count hesitated, blushed and fumbled in his pocket. He drew out a handful of notes. "Take these," he said, "and open the treasury."

"Alas, your excellency," said Tomás, "my virtue is but a battered thing, but I must keep it. I have no key."

The count went out and wandered through the arcades. He came upon Lady Patricia and Miss O'Kelly. They were looking at Salvatierra's shopwindows. Lady Patricia greeted him with a nod—Miss O'Kelly with animation.

"I'm having a struggle with me conscience," she said. So was the count. "Do you see that butterfly?" continued Miss O'Kelly, putting her finger against the glass. "It' marked two hundred and eighty pesos an that's eight pounds. I priced one in Dublin just like it, and it was eighty pounds. They don't know the value of diamonds in Mexico I've ten pounds to do with as I want. Phelim sent it in a letther from Arizona. He's on thi side of the watther travelin' in the States. It' all on account of an Englishman who staye at the Kildare Club for three weeks. Th Englishman thought he could play piquet Now, the question in me mind is, shall I pa Father Flynn the ten pounds I promised him a year ago Easter, or shall I buy the buttherfly It would look iligant, Pat dear, with me blu bengaline."

Lady Patricia laughed. "I am sure, Aun Molly," she said, "that Phelim would rathe you bought the butterfly. I'll take care of you subscription to Father Flynn."

With an exclamation of joy, Miss O'Kell ran into the shop.

"Patricia," said the count, "the treasury i still closed."

"Oh," said Lady Patricia, "why do yo remind me of such tiresome things as th treasury? Didn't you hear Aunt Molly say that Phelim is quite near, in Arizona? I had a wire from him this morning. Read it; it' quite Irish." She handed the count a telegram "Shall I read it?" he asked.

"Of course," she answered.

He read:

I'M RICHER, BUT NO SHORTER. IS THERE HOTEL IN GUAYMAS BIG ENOUGH TO TAKE ME IN WIRE ANSWER. PHELIM

"Will you send this reply for me?" sh asked, when the count had read Phelim telegram.

"To be sure I will," he said.

"How many words are there?" she asked "I'll pay for it."

Thus compelled, the count read her answer

COME, RICH OR POOR, LONG OR SHORT. COME PAT

The count went off with the telegram thinking.

The next afternoon the count came out o the church—his fifth visit since ten o'clock— and there, near the fountain, were Lady Patricia and her aunt. The count marked then from the front steps. There was no mistakin Miss O'Kelly's green parasol.

This time Lady Patricia met him with ani mation. She even came toward him, her fac wreathed in smiles.

"Phelim has come!" she said.

"Quite happy—I'm sure," said the count "He's prompt, isn't he?"

"Yes," said Lady Patricia. "He's alway prompt. He doesn't lose shirt studs, and h never dawdles."

"Ah," said the count.

"Here he comes," exclaimed Lady Pat, an she began to wave her handkerchief.

The count turned and saw, coming from th corner by the clock tower, a man. He had th shoulders of Hercules, the waist of Apollo, th legs of Mercury. When he came closer, hat i hand, the count saw that he had curling chest nut locks, a beard that caressed his chin brown eyes and white teeth, for he wa smiling.

"Pat," he cried as he came within distance "your friend the cardinal is a good one. H puts on no side. He had me up on the balcony opened your letter, took out the check, an read the letter before he even looked at th stamped paper. When a man gets a check in a letter and reads the letter before he looks a the check, he shows breedin'."

"The Count de Lubersac," said Lady Pa tricia, "I present Mr. Phelim Blake."

The two men nodded: the count guardedly Phelim with a smile.

"I think, dear sir," said Phelim, "that yo are not in Guaymas for her antiquities. N more am I. I arrived this mornin' and I've been all over the place already. I was jus thinkin' that time might hang. Twice a da I've to go out to the yacht to propose to Pat Durin' the intervals we might have a crack a piquet."

The count was embarrassed. He was not ac customed to such frankness. He was also em barrassed by the six feet three of Phelim. He

"Ah," said Phelim, "it cost me much to rn what I know of it, and I will gladly im- t that little for the pleasure of your com- nionship. I will play you for love."

The count took counsel with himself. So g as he is playing piquet with me, he thought, long he cannot be making love to Patricia. ow long will it take me to learn the game?" asked.

"As long," answered Phelim, "as you have dy money. When you begin to give due bills have begun to grasp the rudiments of the ne."

dinner on the yacht, the night before, m had been much in evidence. His six feet had impressed the count's six feet. m had been well dressed. Confound him, ght the count, he goes to Savile Row. Why 't he get his clothes at home? Then Phelim alked much and he talked well. He had tories at which the count had been com- l to laugh. He had related experiences of me life, of the peasants, the priests, the , hunting and shooting, his brief stay in ment, what he had seen in Sonora dur- e last few days; and when dinner was Lady Patricia, who had been all atten- said, "Sing for us, Phelim," and they had below, Phelim stooping to save his head; e had struck those mysterious chords the piano, by way of prelude, that si- talk, that put the world far away, that set en to glancing at the women, and the n to glancing at the floor and making f their handkerchiefs, and then . . . he ung.

When Phelim finished singing Miss O'Kelly went over and kissed him, and Lady Patricia went away, her eyes glistening.

The count remembered all those things as he went up the aisle. He had passed that way five times each day for nine days.

He came to the door of the treasury, thinking, not of Patricia but of Phelim—and the door was open.

He went in. The gorgeous color of the place stopped him on the threshold. He saw the embroidered vestments upon which gold was the mere background—jacinths were the stamens of the flowers, and pierced diamonds were the dewdrops on their leaves; he saw the chalices and patens of amethyst and jade, the crucifixes of beaten gold, in which rubies were set solid, as if they had been floated on the molten metal; he saw the seven-light candelabrum, the bobèches of which were sliced emeralds, and then his eyes, groping in this wilderness of beauty, lighted on the turquoise chalice.

"She is right," he exclaimed. "She is selling herself for the most beautiful thing in the world. To steal it is a crime like Cromwell's—too great to be punished," and he put out his hand.

Then, with the chalice and Patricia within reach, he heard a still, small voice, and his hand fell.

He began to argue with his conscience. Who owns this chalice? he asked. No one. The cardinal said it had been stolen. He said no one could sell it because no one could give title. Why, then, is it not mine as well as anyone's? If I take it, whom do I wrong? Great men have never let trifles of right and wrong disturb their conduct. Who would ever have won a battle if he had taken thought of the widows? Who would ever have attained any great thing if he had not despised small things? and he put out his hand again; and then came surging into his mind the provisions of that code which birth, associations, his school life, and most of all his mother, had taught him. What would they say and do at his clubs? Where in all the world could he hide himself, if he did this thing? He turned and fled and, running down the church steps, he came face to face with Lady Patricia and Phelim. They were laughing gaily; but when they saw the count's face, their laughter ceased.

"Have you seen a ghost, me broth of a bhoy?" asked Phelim.

The count did not answer; he did not even hear. He stood gazing at Lady Patricia. For one brief moment, when he stood before the chalice, he had questioned whether a woman who would impose such a condition could be worth winning; and now, before her, her beauty overwhelmed him. He forgot Phelim; he forgot the passers-by; he forgot everything except the woman he loved—the woman he had lost.

"Patricia," he said, "I give you back your promise. I cannot give you the chalice."

The color left her cheeks and her hands flew up to her heart; she gazed at him with love and pity in her eyes, and then, suddenly, her cheeks flamed, her white teeth pressed her lower lip, her little foot stamped upon the pavement.

"Very well," she said. "I regret having given you so much trouble," and she went toward the landing. She took three steps and then turned. The two men stood as she had left them. "Phelim," she said, smiling, "you would do something for me, if I were to ask you, would you not?"

"Try me," said Phelim. "Would you like the campanile for a paperweight?"

"No," she said, "not that, but something else. Come here."

He went to her, and she whispered in his ear.

"I'll bring it to you in half an hour, aboard the yacht," said Phelim, and he started across the plaza.

Lady Patricia went on toward the landing. The count stood watching her. She did not look back. The count looked up at the clock tower. In half an hour, he said to himself, he will bring it to her, aboard the yacht; and he turned and re-entered the church. He went up the aisle, nodded to the sacristan, entered the treasury, took the turquoise chalice, came out with it in his hand, nodded again to the sacristan, went down the steps, crossed the plaza, ran down the landing stairs and jumped into a motorboat.

"To the English yacht!" he cried.

He looked at his watch. It seems, he said to himself, that one can join the criminal classes in about six minutes. I've twenty-four the start of Phelim.

They came alongside the Tara, and the count sprang up the ladder.

"Lady Patricia?" he asked of the quartermaster.

"She is below, your excellency. She has just come aboard, and she left orders to show you down, your excellency."

"Me?" exclaimed the count.

"She didn't name you, your excellency," said the quartermaster. "What she said was, 'A gentleman will come on board soon; show him below.'"

The count speculated a moment as to whether he were still a gentleman, and then went down the companionway. He came to the saloon. The door was open. He looked in. Lady Patricia was seated at the piano, but her hands were clasped in her lap. Her head was bent and the count noticed, for the thousandth time, how the hair clustered in her neck and framed the little, close-set ear. He saw the pure outlines of her shoulders; beneath the bench he saw her foot in its white shoe; he saw, or felt—he could not have told you which—that here was the one woman in all this great world. To love her was a distinction. To sin for her was a dispensation. To achieve her was a coronation.

He tapped on the door. The girl did not turn, but she put her hands on the keys quickly, as if ashamed to have them found idle.

"Ah, Phelim," she said, "you are more than prompt; you never keep one waiting," and she began to play very softly.

The count was embarrassed. Despite his crime, he still had breeding left him, and he felt compelled to make his presence known. He knocked again.

"Don't interrupt me, Phelim," she said. "This is my swan song; listen"; and she began to sing. She sang bravely, at first, with her head held high, and then suddenly her voice began to falter. "Ah, Phelim, dear," she cried, "I've lost my love! I've lost my love!" and she put her hands to her face and fell to sobbing.

"Patricia," said the count. It was the first word he had spoken, and she raised her head, startled. "Here is the chalice, Patricia," he said.

She sprang to her feet and turned to him, tears on her cheeks, but a light in her eyes such as he had never seen.

"Oh, my love," she cried, "I should have known you'd bring it."

"Yes," he said, "you should have known."

She stood, blushing, radiant, eager, waiting.

He stood in the doorway, pale, quiet, his arms at his side, the chalice in his hand.

"Patricia," he said, "I've brought you the chalice, but I do not dare to give it to you. I stole it."

"What?" she cried, running toward him. She stopped suddenly and began to laugh—a pitiful little laugh, pitched in an unnatural key. "You shouldn't frighten me like that, Guy," she said; "it isn't fair."

"It is true," said the count; "I am a thief."

She looked at him and saw that he was speaking the truth.

"No," she cried, "'tis I am the thief, not you. The cardinal warned me that I was compelling you to do this, and I laughed at him. I thought that you would achieve the chalice, if you cared for me; that you would render some service to the state and claim it as your reward; that you would make a fortune, and buy it; that you would communicate with the Vatican, ingratiate yourself with the archbishopric of Sonora—that you would build churches, found hospitals, that even the Holy Father might ask you to name something within his gift; I thought of a thousand schemes, such as one reads of—but I never thought you would take it. No, no; I never thought that."

"Patricia," said the count, "I didn't know how to do any of those things, and I didn't have time to learn."

"I would have waited for you, always," she said.

"I didn't know that," said the count.

"I hoped you didn't," said Lady Patricia. "Come!" and she sprang through the door. The count followed her. They ran up the companionway, across the deck, down the boarding stairs. The count's motorboat was waiting.

"To the muelle in five minutes," cried Lady Patricia to the marinero, "and you shall be rich."

They went into the little cabin. The count still held the chalice in his hand. They sat far apart—each longing to comfort the other, each afraid to speak. Between them was a great gulf fixed—the gulf of sin and shame.

Halfway to the landing, they passed Phelim's motorboat, making for the yacht. The cabin hid them and he passed in silence.

"I sent him for some candy," said Lady Patricia. "I did it to make you jealous."

They reached the muelle in less than five minutes and Lady Patricia tossed her purse to the marinero and sprang out.

"Put the chalice under your coat," she said.

The count obeyed. He had stolen it openly. He brought it back hidden. They crossed the plaza as rapidly as they dared, and entered the church. The sacristan greeted them with a smile and led the way to the treasury.

"They haven't missed it yet," whispered Lady Patricia.

The sacristan unlocked the outer and the inner door, bowed, and left them. Lady Patricia seized the chalice and ran to its accustomed shelf. She had her hand outstretched to replace it when she uttered a cry.

"What is it?" exclaimed the count.

She did not answer, but she pointed, and the count, looking where she pointed, saw, on the shelf . . . the turquoise chalice.

They stared at the chalice on the shelf . . . at the chalice in Lady Patricia's hand . . . and at each other—dumfounded.

They heard a limping step on the pavement and the cardinal came in. His face was very grave, but his voice was very gentle.

"My children," he said, "I prayed God that you would bring back the chalice, but, mea culpa, I lacked faith, and dared not risk the original. Would God let Patricia Blake's granddaughter make shipwreck? The chalice you have, my child, is but silver gilt and glass, but it may serve, some other day, to remind you of this day. Look at it when your pride struggles with your heart. Perhaps the sight of it may strengthen you. Take it, not as the present of a cardinal, or an archbishop, but as the wedding gift of an old man who once was young, and once knew Patricia Blake."

"A wedding gift?" exclaimed Lady Patricia. "What man would ever marry such a wretch as I?"

"Patricia!" cried the count; and he held out his arms.

"My pigeons are waiting for me," said the cardinal; and he went away limping. END

THE DIET THAT TURNED ME INTO A MODEL

e smiled when I left his office, and said, now you will succeed."

Well, I did! On that day, June 14, 1952, I weighed 168 pounds. By December of the same year I weighed 110. In the beginning it was hard to get used to diet fare. A breakfast of grapefruit, boiled egg, toast and coffee is a far cry from prunes with cream, two bowls of oatmeal with sugar and cream, blueberry muffins and hot chocolate. But every time I was tempted to take an extra helping or succumb to a rich dessert, I would say to myself, It looks better on the plate than on your hips. And as my dresses began to feel loose and my belts had to be taken in several notches, I was cheered and determined to stick it out.

As the pounds melted away, my interest in my over-all appearance blossomed. I began taking better care of my skin and hair, and being more meticulous about grooming in general. I purposely bought dresses in a size too small. This confused the salesgirls, but it was another incentive for me to keep on the diet. The pretty small-sized dress waiting in the closet was worth dieting for!

My family and friends were delighted for me. "Maybe your dream of becoming a model will come true," mother exclaimed. By the time I had reduced to 125 pounds, I had some photographs taken and went for an interview at one of the model agencies. They told me I was too heavy (fashion models are *super*slim), but when I explained that I was dieting and planned to lose another 15 pounds, they registered me. Five pounds later—at 120—I was booked for my first modeling job. It was a fashion show and, to be sure, I was the pudgiest girl on the runway—but I was also by far the happiest! At 110 pounds, I was a full-time model—with bookings to keep me busy all week long.

My diet even gets the credit for my happy marriage! Roy, my husband, would never have looked twice at the old 175-pound Linda. We met and started dating when I weighed 135 pounds. He knew how important it was to n e to reduce, and encouraged me right down to the last lost pound. Now he has become so weight conscious he not only watches his own waistline, he keeps an eye on mine. When I am occasionally tempted to eat more than I should, it's Roy who puts his foot down! "Don't forget," he teases, "you were once a fatty!" I'll never forget. But that is a part of my past. Now, I'm living happily in the present—and looking forward to the future.

LINDA LOVES TO COOK!

Still careful about what she eats, Linda nevertheless splurges once a week, "Because I love to cook, and a splurge meal gives me something to look forward to. It may be a Sunday brunch—a Saturday supper—a midweek surprise for my husband. Here are some of my favorite off-diet recipes. They're not overly rich—but you couldn't eat them often and have a slender waistline too!"

Beef Stroganoff: Cut a 1-pound slice beef sirloin into thin julienne strips. Season with salt and pepper and dust lightly with flour. Chop 1 small onion and sauté until transparent, in 2 tablespoons butter. Remove onion and sauté ¼ pound mushrooms, sliced, in saucepan. Remove mushrooms. Add 2 tablespoons more butter and brown the beef strips in it. Put onions and mushrooms back in pan and add ¼ cup tomato juice and ½ cup canned consommé. Cover and simmer 30–40 minutes or until beef is tender. Then add ¼ cup commercial sour cream and heat about 15 minutes. Do not let it come to a boil, or sour cream will curdle. Reseason to taste and serve. Makes 2–3 servings.

Pork Chops with Barbecue Sauce (serve applesauce with this): Cut fat off 4 lean pork chops. Brown in hot skillet. Drain off fat. Mix together ¼ cup catchup, ½ cup water, 2 teaspoons vinegar, 2 teaspoons Worcestershire sauce, a pinch each orégano, basil and tarragon, 1 teaspoon paprika, 1 teaspoon chili powder, ¼ teaspoon ginger and ¼ teaspoon curry powder. Put 1 tablespoon sauce on each chop. Cover and simmer 10 minutes. Turn chops and put another tablespoon sauce on each chop. Simmer another 20 minutes or more, covered, over low heat to prevent burning until chops are tender, basting occasionally with the remaining sauce. Serves 2 or 4, depending on the thickness of the chops.

Shrimp in Cream: Put ½ cup cream, 1 tablespoon butter, 1 tablespoon chopped parsley, 1 tablespoon water, ¼ teaspoon salt, pinch of cayenne and a pinch of thyme in a skillet. Heat and add ½ pound raw, peeled and cleaned shrimp. Simmer about 15 minutes until shrimp are pink. Serve with green noodles (the high-protein brand—35 calories per serving). Makes 2 servings.

Hamburgers à la Linda: Make 4 thin hamburger patties. Put a thin slice each of cheese, ripe tomato and onion on two of the patties. Cover these with the other two patties. Pinch patties together around the edge and broil to your liking. Makes 2 servings.

Nice-for-Sunday-Brunch Chive Omelet: Put 1 tablespoon butter in a skillet. Let it get sputtery hot. Beat 4 eggs slightly with a fork. Season with salt and pepper and add 3 tablespoons commercial sour cream and 3 tablespoons minced chives. Pour in egg mixture and turn down heat. Shake pan back and forth and run knife down through eggs here and there so liquid part can get down to the bottom of the pan. Start rolling omelet while it is still wet but edges are firm. The inside of the omelet cooks while it is being removed from the pan. To roll an omelet, take hold of pan up on a slant. With a spatula in the other hand ease the omelet into a roll, starting at the tipped-up side. Serves 2.

Chicken and Mushrooms: Have your butcher cut up a frying chicken into serving-size pieces, or thaw a package of frozen chicken which is already cut. Season chicken with salt and pepper and rub with a split clove of garlic and some lemon juice. Brown chicken on all sides in 2 tablespoons butter. Add 1 cup sliced fresh mushrooms and ¼ cup consommé. Season with 1 tablespoon minced scallions or chives, and 2 tablespoons minced green pepper. Simmer, covered, until chicken is tender. Serve garnished with parsley. Makes 4 servings.

Danish Meat Balls: Soak 1 slice protein bread in ¼ cup milk. Break up bread with a fork. Mix with ¾ pound ground beef, adding 1 small onion, chopped, ¼ teaspoon salt, some pepper and a good pinch of mace. Shape into balls about as big as a golf ball and dust lightly with flour. Brown in 2 tablespoons butter in a heavy skillet or Dutch oven. Add water to just cover and simmer, covered, about 1 hour. Thicken gravy if you like. Serve with chopped parsley sprinkled over the top. Makes 2 servings. END

OPEN HOUSE... TO 100 TEEN-AGERS

Every Sunday night Violet and Lawrence Allen open their doors—and their hearts—to teen-agers from all over Lynchburg, Virginia.

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

Boonsboro Road, Lynchburg, Virginia
Dear Editors: In the suburbs of a lovely town, surrounded by five acres (to deaden hilarious laughter and protect kind neighbors!), we live in an old-fashioned ten-room house (not counting a 35′ basement) and are blessed beyond comparison with not only a son, 18, and a daughter, 15, but 100 other teen-agers who make up our family "brigade." Sunday nights, cars line both sides of our little by-road and the sun porch is filled with teen-agers. In the basement they are playing table tennis, watching TV, dancing, drinking punch, popping corn, and upstairs some are sitting in front of the fire and others are shooting pool. I am not sure if you would approve of shooting pool and dancing on Sunday nights. Yet I'd rather have my own two youngsters doing it than have them parked on the side of the road somewhere—and after talking to other parents, I find I am well supported in this belief. All our teen-agers, by the way, come to us after six-o'clock church meetings.

All this is leading up to the question of whether you could visit us and see for yourself. There have been so many unfavorable articles on juvenile delinquency I would so like to tell the world about our own teen-agers!

VIOLET ALLEN
(The Woman-Who-Lives-in-a-Shoe)

Big, calm Lawrence Allen occasionally describes his wife teasingly as "a drop of water on a hot stove."

Exactly how diminutive, bouncing Violet Allen finds the time, patience and energy to welcome a throng of teen-aged boys and girls into their home every Sunday night is a question that has baffled more observers than her husband. Besides acting as hostess to the teens, she does all her housework (with daughter Vicky's help), teaches Sunday school, belongs to a Violet does her "visiting" by telephone. She and Lawrence seldom go out, saying, "Our interests are here; if we leave we might miss something!"

On baking Saturdays, teen-agers help ice cupcakes. Once after baking 75 Violet found 35 missing. "Helpers" had liberally helped themselves.

"We don't have to ask the kids to help— they just do."

Violet and daughter Vicky put away weekend groceries, while Larry, 19, reads sports news. Kitchen is favorite spot for family "talk times" and fun.

Since the Allens' antique shop is only a few rods from house, Lawrence is on hand to unload weekly supply of soft drinks, settle disputes, give advice.

Party Pointers from the Allens

■ How do you afford to provide refreshments for a large number of teen-agers every Sunday night? What do you serve? How do you manage to keep the boys and girls busy and out of trouble? Who cleans up after they're gone? Isn't it a lot of work?

■ Violet Allen's answer to these and other questions is brief and practical: Keep it simple.

■ Food? No problem. On Saturday afternoons, Violet bakes about 75 cupcakes (using packaged mix) or 120 cookies. She keeps on the cupboard shelf ingredients for chocolate fudge, several cans of popcorn, "emergency" boxes of assorted commercial cookies. Occasionally a friend sends over brownies or a cake; the invaluable Dr. Pepper dispenser provides cold drinks for all.

■ Serving and cleaning up? That's simple too. Cupcakes are piled on a tray in the basement playroom; boys and girls pass plates of cookies or bowls of popcorn, feel free to return to the kitchen if supplies run low. At the end of the evening, empty soft-drink bottles are replaced in their cases, chairs pushed back into place, trash thrown in the huge wooden box at the foot of the cellar stairs, dishes (usually only a few) returned to the kitchen and rinsed. There are no set rules about cleaning up, and it is true that occasionally all the teen-agers happen to vanish at once, leaving the house rather disarranged. "But it's no trouble really," Violet says. "Lawrence and Vicky and Larry and I can get things straight in a jiffy."

■ Entertainment? The Allens have never attempted to "organize" the Sunday-night gathering. Boys and girls split into groups: some dancing; some playing bridge, chess, table tennis, pool; others simply talking—and eating. The Allens are fortunate in having a house "just made for parties": the enclosed sun porch can be entered directly from outside; boys and girls troop from sun porch to basement (through the ever-popular kitchen) without disturbing the more formal rooms.

■ Discipline? There are only two fixed rules of behavior: strict observance of curfew, no "parking" outside. At 9:30 on school nights and at 11:00 on weekends, Violet walks through the house ringing a curfew bell. Once when she suspected that some of the teen-agers were lingering in cars parked in the drive, she tacked a tactful warning on the avidly read bulletin board; since then there has been no problem. The fact that the group varies in size from fourteen to twenty may possibly account for the noticeable absence of smoking, "toughtalk" and general rowdiness: older boys and girls try to set a good example for the younger ones (often their own brothers and sisters); the younger group wants to live up to the older.

■ Expense? The Allens estimate that their teen-age entertainment averages about $ a month (exclusive of Dr. Pepper's and drinks)—"but that's counting in special occasion parties, when the refreshments are much more elaborate," Violet hastens to add. (At a graduation party last year, she served lime-sherbet-and-ginger-ale punch, a three-tiered cake, and provided party favors for each guest.) "Usually we spend practically nothing."

■ The secret of the Allens' success lies in the simplicity of the Sunday-night gethers. "Boys and girls don't want elaborate game rooms and fancy food," Violet points up. "They just want to know they're welcome.

garden club, a book-discussion group, and both she and Lawrence are active in church work (he a steward at the Court Street Methodist Church) and in P.T.A. work. In her spare time, Violet makes flying trips to the public library, takes homemade custard to sick friends and writes poems.

"Frankly," one neighboring mother admits, "I go crazy when I have a party for ten or twelve. I think, 'How does Violet cope with seventy?' It's not that teens are troublemakers, but they're so high-spirited!" Another, whose daughter is a close friend of Vicky Allen's, says, "Not long ago we fixed up our game room, hoping to relieve Violet a little. But the children would rather go to the Allens' than anywhere else."

Violet is amazed that anyone could honestly believe she "puts herself out" for the teen-agers. "It's purely selfish pleasure," she contends. "Lawrence and I don't do one solitary thing but open the door and say, 'Come in.'"

The open door of the Allen house magnetizes traffic heading north out of Lynchburg, Virginia. Jeeps, sedans and convertibles, instead of speeding to Highway 501, turn with honking horns into a narrow old road—a curve cut off from the main artery years ago when the highway was straightened. The curve is no detour to Lynchburg teen-agers, but a well-established Sunday-night thoroughfare. As car CONTINUED ON PAGE 98

"Everything's available —but nothing is mandatory."

Boys and girls gather in living room to sing as Violet plays accordion. In basement playroom kids dance, play cards or table tennis; in sun porch they crowd about popular pool table, piano. There's no "planned activity"—but plenty to do.

"Blest be the Tie That Binds"

—HYMN NO. 245

At the new Presbyterian church, senior youth-fellowship group conducts meeting outdoors. All boys and girls attend fellowships before heading for Allens' and an evening of fun.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 96 after car pulls up to the big, brilliantly lighted house on the hill, the passengers spill out—girls in bright skirts or Bermuda shorts, boys in sports jackets and white bucks—and voices call from car to car:

"That you, Warren? How's life at V.P.I.?"

"Man, I got the best new Krupa record I want to play for you."

"Hey, who's this? Somebody new?"

A pert little girl who has just arrived introduces herself as Tony, a visitor in Lynchburg. "But the kids at Presbyterian Fellowship said it would be O.K. if I came—will Mrs. Allen care?"

"She'll be tickled to death!" and Tony is one more welcome guest deposited on the crowded front porch. At the threshold of the wide-flung door stands Mrs. Allen, a bowl of hot buttery popcorn in her hand and a delighted expression on her face, framed by its flyaway graying hair. "Y'all come on in," she urges, warmly hugging the girls, grinning at the boys, and talking every minute. "Vicky's down there in the playroom, Larry's about somewhere, a whole gang's on the sun porch shooting pool. I declare it's good to see you all! Monroe, when did you get back from the University of Virginia? And hasn't Fontaine got on a pretty dress? Y'all come in and get yourselves a cold drink, hear?"

Tony, as a newcomer, is hugged, exclaimed over, and drawn straight through the living room (where she gets a pleasant impression of mellowed old furniture, soft lamplight, a fire crackling on the hearth) and into the sun porch. Here, boys CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

"Around this house it doesn't seem you could do anything wrong."

The Allens make no rules or regulations, but teen-agers respect them too much to risk disapproval. All agree that partying at the Allens' makes more sense than hanging around some drive-in. "What's the point of cutting up? We want to be welcome here."

and girls mill around a pool table, and the clicking of billiard balls mingles with the cool precision of a piano, where a boy sits calmly playing Mozart.

"That's Fred," Mrs. Allen says proudly. "He's a genius—can look at a piece of music he's never seen before and play it backwards. Come on, we'll go find Vicky."

Tony, a little confused by now, is hurried into the pine-paneled kitchen and introduced to the group there—three girls busily stirring up a batch of fudge, a couple of boys perched on the wide counter to offer advice (and lick the pan). The pleasant-looking older man in the breakfast nook, engrossed in a game of chess with a redheaded boy, turns out to be Mr. Allen—teasing, soft-spoken and helpful. "Tony, I think Vicky and some of the girls are downstairs," he suggests, noticing that his wife has been pressed into service by the fudge makers.

In the basement playroom, Tony recognizes tall, brown-eyed Larry Allen playing a slashing game of table tennis with his college roommate. Several couples are jitterbugging in their stocking feet to music from a record player; in the dead center of the room a rousing bridge game has attracted a crowd of interested onlookers. Finally spotting the friends who brought her to the Allens, Tony heads for them.

"Well, where'd you disappear to?" asks a pretty brunet girl, squeezing over on the bench to make room.

"First tell me one thing," Tony says, looking dazedly about her at the roomful of boys and girls. "Do the Allens have this many kids here every Sunday night?"

They do. The open door and the simple words of welcome provide reason enough for innumerable teen-agers to consider the Allens' their second home. Not only on Sunday evenings, but morn-till-night during summer and school holidays, they wander in for a game of pool, a cupcake hot from the oven, a songfest around the battered old piano. Many are friends of the Allens' daughter, Vicky, a pretty, popular fifteen-year-old with blond hair and a quick contagious smile. Some are Larry's classmates—he is a sophomore at V. P. I. this year, but is often home on weekends. Yet even when Vicky and Larry are not at home, the young people feel free to stop in; more than once Violet, returning from shopping to a supposedly empty house, has discovered a couple of boys playing table tennis in the basement or chess in the TV den. "They know our door is never locked, and they're welcome to make themselves at home," Violet says.

The "Teen Brigade" (as they are known to the Allens) have been spending Sunday evenings at the white house on Boonsboro Road for more than three years. The group varies in size from week to week; holidays and special parties may swell the number to over a hundred, other weekends there may be only twenty or thirty. The boys and girls, varying in age from fourteen to twenty, may come from "just down the road" or from the Fort Hill section clear across town. Some of them live in the stately columned houses that line Rivermont Avenue and Oakwood Place; others come from less prosperous-looking dwellings. Most attend E. C. Glass High School, but some are college students, and a few go to private preparatory schools—Virginia Episcopal School in Lynchburg, Stuart Hall in Staunton. All, however, are alike in one respect: each is a member of a church-sponsored youth-fellowship group, and as a rule each attends a fellowship service before "eeling on out to the Allens'."

Vicky was twelve when the Sunday-night parties first started. "I was at the Presbyterian Fellowship meeting," she recalls, "and afterward a couple of the girls came home with me. Well, the boys sort of followed us out. Next week, to even things up, I asked a few more girls. And then it just grew."

"Grew" inadequately describes the immediate enthusiastic snowballing of that first impromptu gathering. Word got around. "Man," said one boy to another, "it's great. Mrs. Allen feeds you popcorn and cookies, and there's a pool table." Vicky's friends, just beginning their first tentative dating, were grateful for a place where they could meet casually, without the formality of a prearranged date. Older boys discovered that parties at the Allens' were invariably more fun than "hanging around some drive-in." It was inevitable that in a town the size of Lynchburg (53,000), where teen-agers depend mainly on private or school-sponsored parties, movies or their own ingenuity to amuse themselves, the Allens' casual get-togethers were immediately successful.

Peter, now one of the most enthusiastic members of the Sunday-night gang, remembers when he first heard about the group. "I didn't even know Mr. and Mrs. Allen, and hadn't dated Vicky or anything. So when this fella says, 'Want to go to the Allens'?' I said no at first. It looked like gate crashing to me. Well, when we got there I sort of hung around outside for about an hour, trying to get up enough nerve to go in. But the minute I got inside the door, I felt like a member of the family."

Before long, Sunday night at the Allens' was an established tradition. Except for special occasions such as Halloween, Christmas, graduation, Violet limited refreshments to popcorn, cookies and punch; she allowed boys and girls to serve themselves informally, and to help clean up afterward. Mothers and fathers, relieved to know their children were safe and properly chaperoned in a friend's home, instead of driving aimlessly about or frequenting roadhouses, only gradually realized the full extent of the Allens' hospitality. "I knew my son was always out there," says one mother, "but I had no idea how many others were there."

"Doesn't it make you nervous to have a bunch of kids turned loose among your priceless antiques?" is a question Violet is often asked. She replies that not once has anything been broken or damaged, "and we've had kids here as long as I can remember." Both Allen parents have always encouraged Vicky and Larry to entertain at home; both share a deep interest and pleasure in young people. Violet often says that she wishes they had felt financially able to have children sooner after their marriage, and wishes they had at least twice as many as fill the house now.

Lawrence and Violet were themselves only eighteen when they met, in early spring of 1927, although both had lived in Lynchburg since childhood. (Lawrence, who lived in New Jersey until he was three, complains that he was called "Yank" all through school.) Both were a year out of high school, Violet working as a secretary in the junior high school, Lawrence a shoe designer in a Lynchburg factory. On a night of roller skating at the Y.W.C.A., Violet, who had come to the rink with a date, caught a smile from a tall, attractive boy who looked over his shoulder at her. "I only remembered," she says, "that I'd taken One-A English with him—all I remembered was a little boy in brown pants, with an ol' dollar watch he kept looking at every five minutes." Possibly in the course of smiling back over his shoulder, Lawrence contrived to fall and get his hand skated over and Violet offered assistance. "She looked at my hand very sympathetically," Lawrence remembers, "and the next week she came back to the rink without a date!"

Three weeks after the skating-rink incident, they knew they wanted to be married—but a year later they were still facing parental objections. Both sets of parents agreed that they were much too young, much too insecure financially. (Together they were making about $35 a week.)

Elopement seemed the only solution to their problem, so on March 3, 1928, Violet smuggled a suitcase out of the house, stopped at the school where she worked and prevailed upon a teacher, Mrs. Bernard Schultz, to chaperon Lawrence and herself on their wedding trip to Greensboro, North Carolina. Their elopement was notable for its difficulties. After registering at a Greensboro hotel, they were unable to get a marriage license—Violet looked too young. Mrs. Schultz suggested that they try nearby Salisbury—but they left in such a flurry that Violet's suitcase, containing her pretty new wedding outfit, was left behind at the hotel. They arrived in Salisbury just as the registry office was closing. "I shall never forget," Violet says, "seeing that clerk bending over to lock his office door! He opened up for us, but his secretary had gone home, so I had to type my own marriage license!"

Lawrence and Violet were married by a Presbyterian minister, Violet in the same black dress she had worn to work that morning. There was not even time to buy flowers—but they did remember to telegraph their parents; and when they arrived in Lynchburg on Sunday, they were greeted by an enormous throng of friends and relatives who had been meeting trains all day long. "I always tell Vicky if she ever decides to elope, I want to go along," Violet says now, with a reminiscent grin. "It's too much fun to miss!"

Violet and Lawrence rented a tiny apartment in the hilly downtown section of Lynchburg; of their combined salaries they managed to save about $10 a week. In 1933, however, they both had 10 per cent cuts in their pay; at about this same time, some good friends of theirs decided to open an antique shop in Charlottesville and asked the Allens to join them.

"We didn't know an antique from a hole in the ground," says Violet. "Isn't that right, honey?" And Lawrence says, "Well, I know we used to pass antique shops and laugh at the idea of people actually buying that stuff." However, it was the height of the depression ("We used to flip a dime—if we had a dime—to see if we'd eat or go to a show") and the Allens figured they couldn't lose much.

They gave up their jobs, followed their friends to Charlottesville, and began to learn the antique business. "We went to museums, took courses, stretched out on a rug in front of the fire every night and read, read, read." After eighteen months, they returned to Lynchburg and went into business on their own.

In 1936, Violet and Lawrence were lucky enough to buy for $6500 the comfortable old eight-room house on Boonsboro Road. A year later, Larry was born. "Neither Lawrence nor I believed in having children until we had a real home for them," Violet says. "Children need stability—even to the pictures on the wall and the rugs on the floor. I believe in putting roots down and letting them stay down forever-and-ever-amen!"

The house was admirably suited for children. Its broad level front lawn lent itself to basketball, tag and football; the back yard, plunging abruptly toward a wooded, tangled hollow where a little creek flows, was perfect for playing hide-and-seek, or building tree houses. The house itself, with its typically Southern central hall flanked by wide, high-ceilinged rooms, provided a pleasant background for the Allens' beautiful old furniture, yet was roomy enough to assure plenty of play space for the children. Many of the same boys and girls who spent hours playing kickball on the well-worn front lawn, or making lemonade in the kitchen, have grown up to be the teen-agers who dance in the Allens' basement today.

"Those early years were fun—'member, honey?" Violet says, recalling the days before Lawrence hired an assistant, when they worked side by side in the shop. "We had a speaker hooked up in the children's room at the house and another one in the shop, so I could listen to them while they took their naps. Then when they woke up, I'd get them dressed and they'd come over to help me and their daddy sand and scrape."

Vicky and Larry were brought up on antiques. At Christmas and birthdays, their presents invariably consisted of old and valuable toys—miniature lamps, small ladder-back chairs or drop-leaf tables, quaint dolls, old German marbles, elaborate mechanical banks. Both children loved the antiquing excursions that took them all over the Virginia countryside and occasionally as far north as Bucks County, Pennsylvania. They quickly picked up enough knowledge of old wood and design to spot good pieces, and sometimes made better buys than their parents. ("Just last week I finally sold an old secretary Larry had insisted on buying when he was about nine years old," Lawrence says.) Thus when Larry went to college, he was able to contribute some of the money toward his education.

"Our whole house is furnished with clothes!" Violet once said. The Chippendale chest, she explains, was bought with money she'd set aside for a winter coat; the unusual giant-size Regina music box represents Easter outfits for the entire family. Violet refinished every piece of furniture in the house, and never tires of imagining a story behind each antique: Who was the old-fashioned child who worked the little sampler with its charmingly misspelled words, its bright red strawberries and lopsided brick house? Was the blanket chest (dated 1787 and inlaid with the initials M. B.) meant as a wedding gift for a bride? Most fascinating of all is the grandfather clock that stands in a corner of the living room. On the lower half of its face, numerals and moons are worn and almost unreadable—but the top half has a bright, clear look. "Can't you just picture some neat little woman scrubbing and scrubbing to get the face clean?" Violet says. "But she wasn't tall enough to reach any higher than the three and the nine—so the numbers above that didn't get rubbed away!"

The Allens' furniture is fairly safe from breakage, since the boys and girls congregate mainly in the more informal rooms—the sun porch, the kitchen, the TV den with its comfortable leather sofa and rocking chairs, and the basement playroom. About twelve years ago, the Allens spent $1000 on the basement: they built a retaining wall, completed part of the ceiling ("I reckon by the time we finish that ceiling our grandchildren will be teen-agers!"), and furnished it with sturdy furniture, a $10 tennis table, a record player. Violet and an artistic friend painted a mural to mask the rough concrete walls—a mountain range with a winding stream at its foot, flowing over rocks and breaking into realistic waterfalls and rapids. The mural ends with a white steeple church nestled in a green valley.

That painted church surrounded by calm painted hills has been pointed out as "the only peaceful scene around here!" Violet various

HOW THE ALLENS SPEND THEIR MONEY

The Allens' income varies from month to month, depending on sales of antiques and reproductions. Yearly income averages between $5000 and $6000. Larry's college expenses are taken care of partly by his own savings, and partly by a building-and-loan savings account, now matured, which will pay the Allens $500 each September during Larry's college years.

ly once did the group threaten to get out nd. The problem actually arose from weight of numbers—the Sunday-night d swelled until Violet and Lawrence sim- uld not keep up with them all. Accus- d to knowing every single guest well gh to tease him about his new girl or con- ate him on his latest scholastic honor, ound themselves entertaining boys and hey had never seen before. (The story is of one boy who leaned across the card to ask, "Hey, who lives here anyway?") of the "new" boys had been in trouble ionally—for breaking traffic regulations, shooting BB guns on the street, ringing the big bell at Virginia Episcopal School in the middle of the night.

"Oh, none of the kids ever got into serious trouble," says Elizabeth Evans Richards—at that time Director of Christian Education at the Presbyterian church, and always an enthusiastic backer of the Allens' Sunday-night parties. "But they'd stop at ■ drive-in and drink beer—that sort of thing. Mainly Violet was worried because she didn't know all the children."

Violet and Lawrence discussed the problem with various youth leaders: Elizabeth Evans Richards, Phyllis Osborne (Director of Christian Education at the Methodist church), Mr. and Mrs. John Les Stone (sponsors of the Senior Presbyterian Fellowship), John Cosby, Mr. and Mrs. Everett Bond (active in P.T.A.) and others. They asked the opinions of teen-agers' parents. Finally, the Allens concluded that they simply must limit the group somehow—and the simplest method seemed to be through strengthening the already-existent link with the churches.

So Violet sat down and wrote dozens and dozens of notes explaining the new ruling: to be welcome at Sunday-night parties, each boy and girl must be a member of a church fellowship group. "I felt downright mean doing it," she says now. "Lawrence and I didn't want to exclude anyone. But it worked beautifully—at least twelve of the new kids joined a fellowship, and we never had ■ bit of trouble. But then," she adds firmly, "we didn't expect any trouble. I have never to this day met ■ juvenile delinquent."

Not only Sunday nights, but on a typical Saturday afternoon, the phone rings constantly. The front door bangs, a couple of girls rush in calling for Vicky. At the same time Lawrence wanders in from the antique shop for a midafternoon snack of cake and milk. Immediately voices from the sun porch call, "Mr. Allen, how about ■ game of pool?" A few minutes later the record player starts up in the basement. Violet reminds herself distractedly to feed the four cats, but before she can turn around a lanky, thin-faced boy appears in the doorway, saying hopefully, "Mrs. Allen, I'm about to starve to death." No sooner has he disappeared (well supplied with potted ham, crackers, a banana and two cupcakes) than another boy comes to perch on the counter and discuss summer jobs.

Before Violet can comment, a slender blond girl whirls excitedly into the room, waving a newspaper clipping. "Did you see this in the paper about Sarah being Citizen of the Month? Can I put it up on the bulletin board?" (The bulletin board, crowded with clippings and cartoons, also includes magazine articles the Allens feel might interest teen-agers: advice about going steady, petting, choosing colleges.) The pretty girl whirls on out, the telephone rings, the side door slams—and the cupcakes are surely burning! And at that moment another face appears in the kitchen door.

"Mrs. Allen," says this latest arrival reproachfully, "where were y'all at one-thirty today? I called and no one answered!"

Violet leans against the oven door and laughs helplessly. "I swannee, it's got so I have to apologize if I step outside the door for a second!"

"What the Allens are doing I call real church extension work," one parent commented recently. Another said, "They're just talking if they claim they don't spend a lot of money on that gang!" Still another said, "It means so much to know where my children are, whom they're with, what they're doing."

Violet and Lawrence disclaim all credit. "If these teen-agers are a good bunch—and they are—it's because of three things. First, their own parents are interested in them and care about them. Second, there are so many wonderful youth leaders, both in the church and at school. And third, the kids were above average to begin with—were born that way!"

Violet and Lawrence often ask themselves what will happen to their teen-agers when Vicky and her friends go off to college. Will their house be empty, except during summer vacation and Christmas holidays? Will there be no one to play the piano, dance in the basement, and swipe cold fried chicken from the refrigerator?

One Sunday night recently, these questions were answered. Violet went to the door and there, adding to the crowd already on hand, stood a group of girls she had never seen before. "So little, they could walk right under my arm!" she said—rather inaccurately, since she herself is only five feet two. "They said they had just been promoted from the junior to the senior fellowship, and wanted to know if they were old enough now to come out here on Sunday nights!"

Needless to say, Violet opened the door and said, "Come in!"

wasn't really getting what the school had to offer, and there seemed to be no point in carrying on the experiment any further.

It had been explained to father (as if he didn't know!) that Gretchen was an incurable romantic, totally impractical, out of touch with reality, and impossibly shy. She was disinterested in her work; her grades were uniformly poor. It was not, as Miss Wilbraham had delicately put it, that Gretchen wasn't a charming child; she simply was not Academy material.

I could see Harriet frowning prettily as she wrote this. If she had been taking the maternal tack with me, she had been taking it even more firmly with Gretchen; and since this was the third school Gretchen had run through in the last two years, Harriet must have been pretty well disheartened by now.

The gist of her letter dwelt on the fact that instead of spending the Christmas holiday on a school outing as had been planned, Gretchen would now be at home, that she was eighteen and in need of some suitable young man (the "suitable" was heavily underlined) to partner her during the round of holiday parties, and would I please do something about it. If I would invite some nice suitable classmate (the "suitable" was again heavily underlined) to be my house guest for the holidays, it would take care of things very nicely.

It was my turn to frown. Dismal experience had already taught me that any one of my friends who knew my sisters would no more accept an invitation to squire Gretchen through an otherwise festive week than he would refuse one to partner Harriet. And the word "suitable" kept ringing through my head. Harriet had her own definition of the word in terms of family, background and money. It was hard to imagine anyone who wasn't North Shore or Old Westbury, or proper Boston coming up to that definition.

Wade Cochran was sitting across the desk at the moment. I asked him to be my guest at home for the holidays.

"Why me?" he really wanted to know.

"Because we're brothers in Alpha," I said, "and we ought to get to know each other better. And I'm sure you'll have a terrific time at the house."

"And?"

"And it so happens that I've got a sister who'd give her right arm to meet you."

"I'll bet," he said, and grinned at me so that I suddenly found myself liking him very much. "What's she like?"

That, as they say, was the jack-pot question. You just couldn't pin down Gretchen with some pat definition. Harriet, you might say with justice, was beautiful, charming, sensible, and the words would add up to Harriet. But to say that Gretchen was pathetically plain, that she was a moony, romantic kid who took it out in reading poetry, that she was so terrified of people that she was like a ghost around the house when strangers were there—these things were all true in their own way, but they didn't add up to the real picture. Just as the things Miss Wilbraham had said were each true enough, but still not the whole truth.

It was suddenly very important to me that Wade Cochran understand what I was getting at. And, for all I know, he might have understood, except that I then made the mistake of showing him the photographs.

I had one of those twin frame arrangements with Harriet's picture on one side and Gretchen's on the other, and where Harriet emerged as a misty vision of loveliness Gretchen looked gaunt and angular and a little frightened. I liked that picture of Gretchen, because I liked Gretchen so much, and the picture brought her very much to life. But looking at it through Wade's eyes, so to speak, I knew I had made a mistake showing it to him, and I knew from his expression that the game was all Harriet's. He was at the house that Christmas week as Gretchen's partner, all right, but it wasn't Gretchen who brought him there.

It was not a good Christmas week for me, although it should have been. There was a cold rain nearly every day, so we did a good deal of lounging around in the game room talking. Interesting talk, too, because Wade was as strange to us as we were to him, and instead of the weary, familiar conversation about family and friends we spent most of the time in a comfortable exploration of one another's ideas.

That is, Harriet and Wade and I did. Gretchen would sit off to the side, her hands usually folded tight in her lap, and if anything was said directly to her by Wade she would go rigid and look as if she wanted to sink through the floor. It took me just one day to realize that whatever Wade felt for Harriet Gretchen felt for Wade in double measure. And, obviously, all she required was to sit like a shadow in the same room with him and listen to him talk. It never struck her to challenge Harriet's proprietorship, even though Harriet was taken off every evening by somebody else, and Gretchen was left to Wade. But I saw him come to think of her as I did, a younger sister needing to be cherished.

Meanwhile we talked lazily through the days, and the picture of Wade Cochran be-

, and it didn't leave me much of an nt. Nor, as I knew, would it do any talk to Gretchen about it. She had a ooking at you with a wide-eyed eager- ile you talked and yet not hearing a u said that was absolutely confound- ing. It was as if she had blown a huge bubble out of her own imaginings and was living right inside it where you couldn't touch her.

For that matter, Wade himself lived pretty much in his own clouds of glory when we got back to college. The spring term was a hard grind, what with clearing up papers and work for graduation, but it seemed to me that Wade spent most of his time either talking Harriet or writing letters to Harriet. He wrote her almost every day, and she answered him once every few weeks, which made her letters that much more of an occasion. I'm sure she never said anything to encourage him, but that didn't matter. He was reading between the lines, and what he saw there it would take a Keats or Shelley to describe.

The blowup came at the graduation ball. Wade invited Harriet, and she turned him down. But she came, all right, with Gordon Edgely, who was president of Alpha and who sailed his own boat in the North Shore regattas and whose father, among other things, was the Edgely Corporation.

PROGRESS RETORT

By LAURENCE C. SMITH

When children of the cave man played
They cluttered up the cave
With rocks and insects, sticks and bones,
The treasures they would save.

They drew weird pictures on the walls
For mothers to compare.
The boyish chips off older blocks
Dragged girl friends by the hair.

They even lost their father's clubs,
Fouled up his fishing trap.
They scampered in and out all day
And never closed the flap.

They had a happy childhood in Their prehistoric way.
All this, of course, was long before
Our more enlightened day.

I knew, of course, that she'd be coming with Gordon, but I hadn't had the courage to tell Wade about it. I was sorry about that when I saw him as he caught sight of Harriet coming into the ballroom. He took one step toward her, and then Gordon came up beside her and she slipped her hand into his. Wade stopped short; then he quickly turned and went out a side door before I could get to him.

When I got back to the Alpha house early in the morning he was gone, and his things were gone with him. I wasn't really surprised. As I saw it, since I was identified with Harriet he was just washing his hands of us in the quickest possible way.

So Wade Cochran walked out of our lives, and for a while I felt a little guilty about it. Not too long, however. There was too much happening. I served my time in the Army, and when I got out there was a series of crises with my father, because I went to work as assistant stage manager of Time Out of Hand instead of going into his office. The bug really bit me then, and the biggest explosion came when I put most of the money mother had left me into my own production. There was no living in the house after the play flopped, so I moved to Manhattan and kept up my family duties more or less by remote control.

While I was readying a second production Harriet married Gordon, and from then on had her own hard time in keeping married. Gordon, as it turned out, had an insatiable fancy for any trim ankle that passed by, and had all the money and time he needed to indulge the fancy. Being kept in close rein by his wife was not his idea of marriage, and whenever he rebelled there were dramatic separations followed by equally dramatic reunions.

The only one of us who seemed remote from all this furor was Gretchen. If she changed at all, it was hard to see it. She moved around the orbit of the family in the same quiet way, sunk in her books, her long walks along the shore, her thoughts, whatever they were.

Now and then some young man would come to the house, favor her with his company for a short while, and then move on. If she cared one way or another, she didn't show it. But I don't think she did. I never saw her look at any of them the way she had looked at Wade Cochran, which, I thought, was just as well. Gretchen, no matter how you took her, just didn't add up to what a man was looking for.

And that's how things stood, when out of nowhere Wade Cochran came back into our lives. I was walking along Seventh Avenue to the Pennsylvania Station, heading for a weekend at North Shore; he was coming down the street from the opposite direction; and there we were. Nothing predictable; nothing planned. It was just that at that time and that place Wade Cochran was obviously destined to meet me, and wind up coming out to North Shore for dinner with the family.

We talked a good deal on the train, rehashing the seven years since we last saw each other, and when I mentioned Harriet and her marriage I found he knew about it. He had seen it in the papers.

"You'll probably see her tonight," I said. "She and Gordon usually come out for dinner on Fridays."

"Fine," he said soberly. "You know we do a lot of business with Edgely. It's a big outfit."

I was glad he took it like this, but at the same time I was being made more and more uncomfortable by Wade himself. He was the complete young executive now, right down to the leather portfolio under the arm and the platitudes about business conditions, but he didn't look happy in the role. He was thin and sallow, and instead of the easy smile I remembered, he had an air of frowning concentration. He wasn't the old Wade at all. The easy-going assurance that had been such an important part of him had just washed down the drain somewhere.

At dinner, however, he was a great success. Harriet was her sweetest self, Gordon was amiable, and Gretchen was content to hang on whatever Wade said. As for my father, he sized up this new Wade, approved what he saw, and by the time coffee was set on the table was using him as a means of getting over to me the ancient sermon on Being Sensible.

It was a crime, wasn't it, father demanded of Wade, his face red with emotion, when a man shirked his responsibilities? You couldn't call it any less when he played around with a lunatic business like the theater, could you?

It was an old game to me, but I could see Wade glancing at me uncomfortably, and I felt sorry for him. I felt even sorrier for him when he finally undertook to speak up for me.

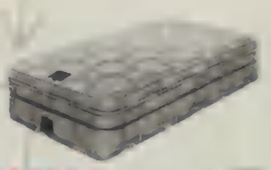
"After all, sir," he said to father, "we're not all of us happy doing the same thing. Maybe it's better sometimes to do what you want to do. Maybe it works out better for you."

"How?" father said icily. "I'm interested in learning the advantages to be found in wasting time and throwing away money."

"Well, I wouldn't put it that way," Wade said uneasily. "But take me, for example. I'm doing fine now. Doing just fine. But I used to think about a farm out in Kentucky, a nice spread just for breeding race horses, and sometimes I wonder—if I could lay my hands on the kind of money it would take ——"

"Race horses!" my father said. He stared at Wade. "You don't mean that?"

Wade shrugged in self-deprecation. Obviously he was preparing to retreat, to explain himself away, but he never had the chance.



"He does mean it!"

It was so astonishing hearing her speak out like that, hearing that flatly declarative statement coming from her, that I couldn't understand at first that it was Gretchen saying it. We all turned toward her in blank disbelief.

"He does mean it," she said defiantly, and then she looked at Wade with her eyes shining. "Don't you?"

Something strange happened to him as I watched. He had been so close to Gretchen so many times before, and yet he had never really seen her. Now he was seeing her for the first time, looking at her with a dazed sense of discovery. It seemed to do something magic to him. To stiffen his shoulders, and bring back the old assurance into his voice.

"Of course I mean it," he said. And it was to Gretchen he said it, not to the rest of us.

"I'm glad. When you've wanted something all your life it's wrong to just give up on it. It's like—oh, it's like giving up on yourself."

Wade's lips quirked in a wry smile. "But you'll have to admit that it's hard to keep your big idea from cooling off when it needs an awful lot of money to keep it warm."

"Just how much money would it need? I mean, to raise horses the way you said."

"Plenty. But what difference does it make?"

"Because," said Gretchen, "I have a great deal of money. And I think a horse farm would be a very good investment."

Father looked at her in horror. "You don't know what an investment is!" he thundered. "And I'll thank you not to talk like a fool in front of me."

"I am not talking like a fool," Gretchen said in a tone no one had ever heard her use before. "Mother left each of us money to do with as we wanted, and I know exactly what I want."

"You know nothing of the sort," father said dangerously. "And I forbid you to risk a penny of that inheritance on any such crackbrained scheme as this."

Gretchen did not even flicker an eyelash, but turned to me inquiringly. "Billy, how much money would you say it comes to?"

I had to clear my throat before I could speak. "About eighty thousand."

"Do you think that would be enough to start with?" she asked Wade anxiously.

"Gretchen," Wade said, and the way he said it, the way they looked at each other, somehow gave the impression that they were all alone in the room, "that's a wonderful offer. It's the most generous thing anyone could possibly do for me. But I can't accept it. You understand that, don't you?"

My father snorted approvingly. "Eighty thousand in gilt-edged shares," he said to Wade. "Can you see anyone with an ounce of sense throwing that kind of money away?"

"But I'm not throwing it away, father," Gretchen said patiently.

"I don't care what you call it," father said. "And I am glad that Mr. Cochran is too much of a gentleman to take advantage of you."

"I am not throwing it away, father," Gretchen repeated in a bright, clear voice, "because . . . I expect to go along with it."

"Go along with it?" my father said in a tone of utter bafflement. "I don't understand."

But Harriet did. "Gretchen," she said wrathfully, "you are out of your mind. That's positively indecent!"

"For heaven's sake," father demanded of us all, "just what is she proposing to do?"

Gretchen's face was very white, alarmingly so. "I will make myself perfectly clear," she said, and took a deep breath. "I am proposing marriage to Mr. Cochran. I am offering him all my money and me in the bargain. I don't know anything about horses, but I can learn. And I can learn to keep house for him, too, and I'm sure I can have perfectly lovely children. And if you think I'm joking about this, I'm not. I mean it so much that it hurts, so don't anybody try to make a joke of it."

Wade suddenly reached across the table and caught her hand in his. "Do you think you have to offer money?" he demanded roughly. "Do you think ——"

"Or what's more to the point, dear," Harriet said to Gretchen in a brittle voice, "don't you think that this is something that could have been worked out on a nice moonlight walk with Wade? I hardly think that the dinner table is the place to lay your soul bare. Of your fuzzy ideas on what makes an appropriate marital arrangement."

"I'm sorry," Gretchen said. She sat rigid, her hand still clasped in Wade's. "But I felt—had reason to feel—that Wade wasn't very much interested in moonlight walks with me. You understand that, don't you, Harriet?"

My father stood up and flung down his napkin. "And I can understand that this is the most foolish, the most reckless talk I have ever heard in this house," he said. "I will not listen to another word of it!"

He was the first to leave the room, but the rest of us were not far behind. All except Gretchen and Wade, who remained at the table unaware of anything but each other, when I closed the door behind me. In the living room father dropped into his chair fuming and Harriet paced up and down in a fine state of nerves. Only Gordon found it funny.

"The poor guy," he said. "It'll take him an hour to untangle her and get things under control. And believe you me, it'll be the last time he comes within a mile of that girl."

Gordon was never wronger about anything in his life. Wade and Gretchen left the house without farewell or father's blessing late that night while we were all in bed, and the first message from them was a telegram which came next day from some small town in Maryland, and was signed "Mrs. Wade Cochran."

Room for Variety in A FACTORY-MADE HOUSE

This attractive prefab adapts to the lot, the family and the budget.

By CAROL L. MERCADO

The factory-built home above gives proof that standardization of quality need not mean lack of variety, livability or charm. This adaptable one-floor plan lends itself to many ways of living. See how the dining alcove provides a formal eating area; the serving bar separating it from the kitchen may be used for an informal breakfast counter or for bonus kitchen work space. The bedroom nearest the spacious living room is accessible from both the living area and the bedroom hall, giving it great versatility. Depending upon the family's needs, it can be a bedroom opening handily to the hallway and bath, or a study, a playroom, a TV room. Bedroom closets are generous in size, have space-saving sliding doors. In the basementless version of this model, the area used here for the cellar stairs becomes an oversized heater room and a preplumbed laundry convenient to kitchen, bedrooms, baths.

This attractive brick finish is one of six selections in materials. Interior variations include the choice of basementless or full-basement plan, and enlargement of the house at the bedroom end in 4′ modules.

Depending upon the outside finish, plan variation and optional equipment selected, this packaged house may be purchased for as low as $12,740, exclusive of lot and landscaping. The fully equipped full-basement model shown here is in Bel Air, Maryland, and sells for $22,000. This price includes a large, fully landscaped lot, year-round air conditioning, brick-veneer exterior, a handsome living-room fireplace, tile in bath and lavatory, built-in wall oven and countertop range, patio and garden walls, carport, covered terrace and driveway.

In recent years the prefabrication industry, in applying modern manufacturing methods to home building, has achieved high standards of quality, performance and economy in the mass-produced, factory-made house. Savings resulting from assembly-line mechanized production are passed on from the reputable prefabricator to the buyer in terms of a sturdier house, for less money, in less time.

I was the only one Gretchen wrote to after they bought their place in Kentucky, not far from Lexington, and Gretchen was hardly a satisfactory correspondent. The letters were a scrawled few lines, and it was difficult to extract the news in them. I gathered that Kentucky was beautiful, that race horses were surprisingly delicate, that a baby was coming. When the baby came I sent it a gift, but I was the only one in the family who did.

During this time I saw very little of Harriet and my father. Harriet finally divorced Gordon, and this, the first divorce in our family, did not make father's moods any more bearable. But Harriet moved back into the house, tried world cruises, oil painting, and finally psychoanalysis to settle her nerves, and from what I could see had no great success with any of them. There was always a tautness in her now, a restlessness, which made it hard to be in her company for any length of time.

I suppose it was that restlessness which made her suddenly decide to go along with me when Gretchen invited me to the farm. Whatever the reason, there she was with me in the plane, and there she was when we landed, running ahead to throw her arms around Gretchen and to kiss Wade with just the right degree of constraint. Wade had filled out considerably; he looked very big and brown. Gretchen was brown, too, except for the tip of her nose, which was red and peeling, but she was as lanky as ever. The more so in worn dungarees and a sweater. Next to her, Harriet looked fantastically exotic and out of place.

Then Wade got our bags and herded us all into an old station wagon. "It's not much," he said, "but in our business you get what's left after the horses have had theirs."

Gretchen turned around in her seat to face Harriet and me. "He makes it sound awful," she said, "but it really isn't. It was just bad for a couple of years, but last year we had six colts at the Saratoga sales, and they all brought top money. And this year we're going to fix the whole outside of the house. Bubba's room needs a lot of fixing too."

"Bubba!" said Harriet.

"Oh, that's the baby," Gretchen said. "I know it sounds silly, but the stableboys call him that, and we sort of picked it up. He wouldn't know who you meant if you called him anything else."

It was a strange ride for anyone who had known Gretchen and Harriet back in the North Shore days. Gretchen talked steadily, as if all the words stored up for years had to come out, while Harriet after a few attempts to put in a word was stony silent. We drove like that along the highway, and then into a rutted dirt road, and at last Wade pulled up before an immense barn.

"I'll be with you in a minute," he said. "I just want to check the feed."

He got out of the car, and Gretchen slipped out, too, and walked along with him toward the barn. There was a strong smell of wood smoke and wet grass in the air, and on the rise of the hill ahead I could see the house. It looked as sprawling and shabby, but as comfortable, as an old shoe.

"Wade's right," I said to Harriet. "If that house had as much work put into it as this barn it would be quite a mansion."

But she wasn't listening to me. She was watching Wade and Gretchen, Gretchen looking up at Wade, saying something to him eagerly, and Wade's arm suddenly going around Gretchen's waist, pulling her to him in a tight hug. I was sure then of what I had always felt. That night at the dinner table Wade had found the Gretchen who had been there all along, just waiting to be found.

Harriet turned her head away in a quick gesture, and then I realized that she was crying. Silently, her hand over her face, as I had never seen Harriet cry before.

"What is it?" I said. "Is something wrong?"

"No," she said. "No. Just leave me alone."

But I knew what it was. And I knew that though it might be hard to take, there was hope in it for her too. It was the pain of discovering after all these years that in this hopelessly romantic world of ours the best things must inevitably go to the romantic.

the Pontalba Apartments, in the heart of the old French Quarter, the Vieux Carré. You might have enjoyed this very same supper over a hundred years ago, when the vivacious Baroness Pontalba built her handsome red-brick and lace-balconied house—in this dining room, with its gleaming silver and crystal, Aubusson rug, and cascade of wisteria-colored curtains. All these dishes have been an enduring joy for generations in New Orleans. That's why we want you to draw from New Orleans' fabulous treasury of good food for your own holiday hospitality this season. And hurry back to your party; it's lively, and lots of fun!

DAUBE GLACÉ

Have your butcher give you a well-larded piece of round of beef weighing 5–6 pounds, 1 veal knuckle, cracked, and 1 pork shank. Mix together 4 bay leaves, broken into pieces, 4 cloves garlic, crushed, ½ teaspoon thyme, ½ teaspoon marjoram and ¼ teaspoon sage. Spread each of 4 slices of lean bacon with this mixture. Add 1 whole black pepper and 1 whole allspice to each strip. Roll the strips up. Make 4 incisions in the beef and push the bacon strips in. Salt the beef well. Marinate it for 24 hours in 2 cups vinegar, 1 cup water, 2 large onions, 2 cloves garlic, crushed, 3 bay leaves, 2 tablespoons whole allspice and ¼ teaspoon cayenne pepper. Turn the beef several times in the marinade.

The next day remove the meat and onions, but do not discard the marinade. In a large Dutch oven or heavy pot, sauté the onions until golden brown in 3 tablespoons shortening or salad oil. Then add the meat, browning it on all sides. Add the veal knuckle and pork shank. Add also 1 quart sliced onions, 6 green onions, green stems and all, 5 carrots, cut into pieces, 5 stalks celery and tops, ¾ cup chopped green pepper, 6 sprigs parsley, 1½ quarts water and 1 cup marinade. Season with 2 tablespoons whole allspice, 2 tablespoons whole black pepper and 2 tablespoons salt. Cover tightly and simmer 3–4 hours until meat is tender. Remove meat and simmer the veal knuckle, pork shank and broth another 2–3 hours so that the veal knuckle has cooked for a total of 6 hours. Remove the pork and veal-knuckle pieces from the broth. Cool.

Strain the broth through several thicknesses of cheesecloth and chill. Skim off all the fat. When meat has completely cooled, trim off outer fat and slice meat very thin crosswise; cut into pieces to fit a 9″ x 5″ x 3″ pan or mold. Heat the broth, as it will have jellied. Remove from heat and cool. Chill until partially thickened. You may then make a flower design on the bottom of the pan or mold, using raw turnip, carrot and parsley. (The flat parsley makes the prettiest "leaves," so save the frilly kind to ring round the platter later on.) Pour in a thin layer of the broth and chill until set. When design has set, dip each slice of meat in the broth and place perpendicularly in the pan until the mold is filled. Place a few slices on the sides and fill up any space with diced beef, veal or pork. Slowly pour the rest of the broth over the meat. Chill overnight or until set. When it comes to ornamenting the platter, lemon baskets filled with cooked peas which have been marinated in French dressing and chilled will complete the picture.

After sipping a cup of the celebrated café noir or café au lait at a tiny sidewalk table, a fine morning's venture in New Orleans is a stroll through the arcaded French Market. Stalls at every hand offer blue and green crabs, pearly shelled shrimp and vegetables in vast array. No wonder this wealth of sea food and garden goodness is so often combined in local kitchens! Shrimp and eggplant make a particularly happy duet teamed in the following:

CREOLE STUFFED EGGPLANT

Cut 6 medium eggplants in half lengthwise. Scoop out the meat from the purple beauties, but leave 6 fairly substantial shells. In a large skillet sauté 12 scallions, finely chopped, and 6 medium onions, also chopped fine, in 3 tablespoons shortening or salad oil until lightly browned. Chop the eggplant pulp and add to onions with 1½ cups finely chopped green pepper. Add 6 tablespoons chopped parsley, 6 crushed bay leaves, 1 tablespoon salt, ¼ teaspoon thyme and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Meanwhile, remove crusts from 12 slices white bread and soak the slices in 1½ cups milk. Squeeze dry and add to eggplant mixture. Stirring constantly, cook it until all ingredients are well blended. Cut 3 cups cooked frozen or canned peeled and deveined shrimp into small pieces. Add to eggplant mixture, but reserve a few whole shrimp to adorn the top. Stuff 6 of the eggplant shells with this mixture and sprinkle with buttered bread crumbs. Place in a shallow baking pan, adding just enough water to cover the bottom. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 20–30 minutes. Garnish with the shrimp. One eggplant shell will serve 2 people.

Jambalaya recipes are varied as the luxuriant foliage in a Garden District patio. Dip into this fascinating rice dish—close of kin to the Spanish paella—and your fork will spear a rosy shrimp, plump oyster, or perhaps a morsel of chicken. As it usually boasts bits of flavorful ham, the name is most probably taken from the French word, jambon. However, the tale is told that it originated in an eighteenth-century café when, late at night, a gentleman of importance came to dine. Not being able to offer the specialties of the house at such an hour, the proprietor said to his chef, Jean, "Balayez" (blend together everything that's good). The forthcoming harmonious mixture so pleased the visitor that he named it "Jean Balayez."

HAM-AND-SAUSAGE JAMBALAYA

In a large skillet, heat 2 tablespoons shortening or salad oil. Thinly slice 1 pound hard Italian sausage. (Though the peppery Creole chaurice is traditionally used, this will serve you in excellent stead.) Sauté the sausage in the skillet with 1½ cups chopped onion, ½ cup diced celery, ½ cup chopped green peppers, 8 green onions, chopped, and 2 cloves garlic, crushed, until lightly browned. Add 2 cups canned tomatoes. Season with 2 bay leaves, 2 teaspoons salt and ½ teaspoon thyme. Simmer about 10–15 minutes. Add 2 cups diced precooked ham and 2 tablespoons chopped parsley. Then add 3 cups converted rice and 4 cups water. Cover tightly. Simmer over low heat for about 30–40 minutes until liquid is absorbed and flavors are well blended.

The simplest of salads is considered the only proper partner for hot Creole dishes—and rightly so. But every leaf must be snapping-crisp—and the dressing is of cardinal importance.

MIXED GREEN SALAD WITH NUTMEG

Choose an assortment of greens: lettuce, romaine, chicory, escarole. Wash, dry and tear into bite-sized pieces. Chill them thoroughly. Into your wooden salad bowl crush 1 clove garlic and add ¼ teaspoon salt. Make the dressing right in the bowl. As you know, the classic proportions are 3–1, so combine 3 tablespoons salad oil with 1 tablespoon vinegar (wine or tarragon preferred) and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Mix well. When the dressing is made, slice into it 4 nice tender shallots or youthful green onions, including a little of the green tops. Add the greens, sprinkle a scant ½ teaspoon nutmeg over the top and toss.

Among the street vendors' musical cries which once filled the air of the Vieux Carré was the chant of "Watermelon! Watermelon! Red to the rind,

If you don't believe it jest pull down your blind.
You eat the watermelon and preee-serve the rind!"

Indeed the rind was preserved. And local cooks still mellow it today into translucent chunks of spicy perfection. Crocks aplenty are ranged in cool cellar depths—along with zesty relishes—in readiness for Carnival entertaining.

WATERMELON-RIND PRESERVES

Cut up watermelon rind into bite-sized pieces to make 7 pounds. Remove almost all the soft pink part and the outside green. Place the rind in a large bowl or kettle. Cover with water mixed with 2 teaspoons alum. Soak overnight in the refrigerator.

Next morning combine in a large kettle 1 quart white vinegar, 1 pint water, 5 pounds sugar, 6 pieces stick cinnamon and 1 tablespoon whole cloves. Heat. When this sirup boils, add the rind and cook until very tender. Place the rind in sterile pint jars. Cover with sirup and seal while they are still hot. This is best if it stands for several weeks before it is eaten. Makes 5 pints.

VEGETABLE RELISH

Chop or put through the coarsest blade of a food grinder the following: 4 scraped carrots, 1 medium head washed and cored cabbage, 6 medium peeled onions, 2 seeded green peppers, 2 seeded red peppers and 2 celery stalks. Put vegetables in a large bowl. Cover with cold water. Let stand 3 hours. Drain. In a large kettle, mix 1 pint cider vinegar, 3 cups sugar, 1 teaspoon mustard seed and 1 teaspoon celery seed. Bring to a boil. Add drained vegetables. When liquid again reaches boiling point, remove from the heat. Pack in sterile jars. Seal. Makes 5 pints.

To climax the feast, a frosty tower of dessert glistens with jewels of fruit. It's a dessert quite befitting a Carnival king!

MARDI GRAS BOMBE

Beat 6 eggs until light and thick, adding 1½ cups sugar little by little as you beat. Add 1½ cups light corn sirup, 6 cups buttermilk, ¾ cup lemon juice and 3 tablespoons grated lemon peel. Pour into freezing trays. Freeze until almost but not quite firm. Scrape the sherbet into a chilled bowl. Break it up with a spoon. Beat quickly with a rotary beater or electric beater and return to the trays and freeze until almost firm again.

While making the above sherbet, mix together 1½ cups strawberry preserves, 1 cup canned crushed pineapple (undrained), a 1-pound jar diced mixed candied fruits and 2 teaspoons rum extract. Allow this to stand, covered, at room temperature at least 4 hours.

Rinse a 4-quart mold, and when the sherbet is ready, layer it with the fruits into the mold. Be sure to begin and end with sherbet. Freeze until solid, at least overnight. Unmold and garnish with galax leaves, more candied fruits and mint.

From New Orleans cooky jars comes an enticing assortment of delicate and chewy confections decked with the confetti of frosting and sugared almonds. Some are sold on city streets, such as the Stage Planks. This recipe will give you miniature versions of the fat raisin-centered cookies which have brought squeals of delight from small fry for generations.

STAGE PLANKS

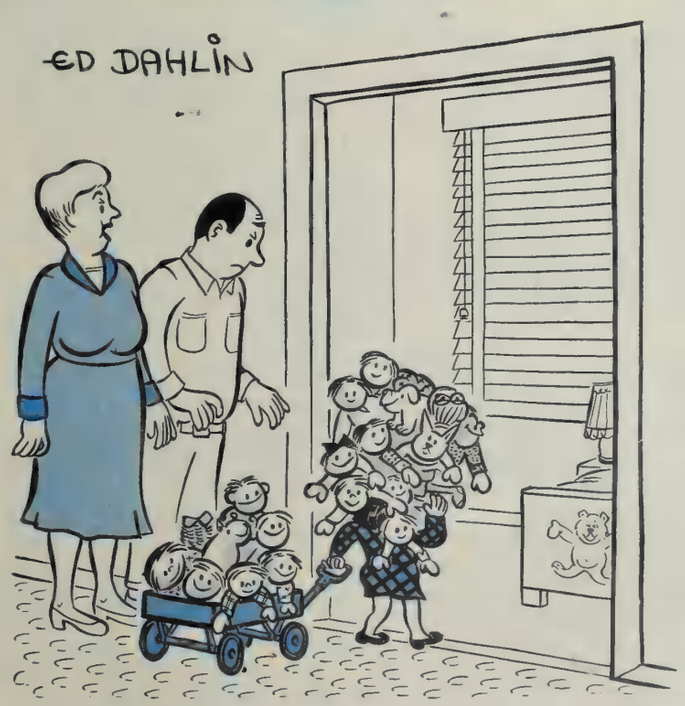
Remember how Cleo Dulaine in Saratoga Trunk enlivened a party with her disguise as a praline-vending mammy? Calico-clad and bright tignon tied round her head, she passed out the pecan patties from a basket over her arm in true Vieux Carré fashion. Though this figure with the smile as sweet as her wares is not the familiar sight she once was in New Orleans, the candy is ever available. Here are two varieties, both delectable:



PRALINES

Mix together 4 cups brown sugar and ⅔ cup water. Bring slowly to a boil, stirring constantly. Add 2 tablespoons butter and 2½ cups chopped pecans. Cook to the soft-ball stage, stirring constantly (232° F.). Remove from the heat. Stir until it starts to thicken and then spoon rapidly onto buttered baking sheets. Cool. If the candy gets too thick, put over hot water and stir until it thins again. Makes 4–5 dozen.

CREAMY PRALINES

Combine 2 cups granulated sugar and 1 cup brown sugar, ½ cup milk, ½ cup sweetened condensed milk, ¼ cup butter and ¼ teaspoon salt. Bring slowly to a full rolling boil, over medium heat. Add 3 cups broken pecans and continue boiling until the candy reaches the soft-ball stage (232° F.). Remove from the heat and stir only enough to give a creamy look. Spoon out on buttered baking sheets. Cool. Makes 6 dozen.

This January, may your celebration, with all the gaiety and warmth of the Mardi Gras spirit, spark the beginning of the brightest and best of new years! END really only wanted to dance with the prettiest girls, like Jo Anne, but then I would see some poor thing marooned and feel awful and go ask her instead. But it was shallow kindness, for no sooner had I done so than I would be chewing the inside of my cheek and wondering if I was going to be stuck. The shiftings of halfhearted conscientiousness and flighty panic gave me sweaty palms I was always furtively wiping on the hip of my tux.

I danced with Edwina until my left hand was moist beyond social acceptability. I couldn't jerk it away to wipe it, and clearly nobody was going to cut in. I said, "Gee, it's hot in here. Let's go on the porch and sit down for a while, why don't we?"

We made our way among the couples, me wiping my hand, and stepped out on the long second-story veranda, overlooking a patio planted with banana and palm trees. I looked sternly at a steel chair and formally moved it two inches for Edwina to sit down; then I brought two paper cups of water from the cooler. These we carefully drank in silence, and then Edwina slowly crushed her cup and tore it into small pieces. Meanwhile I stared. Her straight yellow hair was brushed severely back, and under the lights along the wall her high curved forehead gleamed as gently as pearl. Her face was centered high up, in her forehead and gray eyes; her serious, thin mouth I hardly looked at. I was always riotously and guiltily thinking about kissing people, for lack of conversational topics, and my impulse was to kiss Edwina on her clear, vulnerable-looking forehead. Now that I looked at her, for the first time really, I was puzzled why Edwina wasn't pretty. Her hair was pretty, her skin was, her ——

I suddenly saw her lips finish a sentence I hadn't heard a word of. I said, "What'd you say?"

"I just said, you were looking at me so funny. Is there a smudge on my face?" She lifted a thin hand and touched her cheek uncertainly.

"Oh, no, I was just—I mean, I was thinking you look . . . pretty," I said, whereupon Edwina flinched, and my remark fell between us like a new-laid egg. In an effort to bury it, I opened my mouth and loosed a second horror. "And that's an awfully pretty dress you have on tonight." We both stared aghast at the dress, which I observed dimly was green. Then, utterly undone, we sprang up from our chairs, bits of cup falling softly to the floor like snow, and fled back to the dance floor.

As we stepped through the French doors, Jo Anne whirled past in the grip of a handsome, dangerous boy a year older than me, who rode a motorcycle. My heart went up in flames like a ball of crumpled paper. I hardly noticed that Edwina had stopped dead by my side. I turned and saw her stricken face, and I said, "What's the matter, Edwina?"

She said, "You were awfully nice to dance with me, but I don't want you to be stuck with me ——" She began to back away.

"What're you talking about, what're you talking about?" I cried distractedly.

"Please, don't feel responsible. I'm used to it. I'll go comb my hair for a while, that's what I always do."

I caught her wrist. I could see Jo Anne not far away, laughing, and I was scared Edwina was about to cry, she was all red in the face. I said, nearly in tears myself, "What do you mean, stuck with you? I like to dance with you, Edwina, honestly. Please don't talk like that."

Some time later, when one of the partners on Edwina's dance card had appeared and I was at large again, I hunted up a buddy who was playing odd-or-even for nickels in the stag line. "Hey, Stan, do me a favor?" He looked wary, and when I said, "Go dance with Edwina Moore," he dropped his nickel in alarm.

"Are you crazy?" said Stan. "What I want to dance with her and be stuck the whole rest of the night for?"

"You won't be. I'll send somebody, promise."

"But she's practic'ly a mile taller'n me and she's so serious and everything. Aw, man, have mercy." In sheer uneasiness he'd begun to talk out of the corner of his mouth and snap his fingers to the music. Then he looked at me more considerately. "What's the matter? You bring her?"

"No. I just feel bad about her. Come on, five *min*utes, for pete sake."

Stan closed his eyes and nodded glumly. "But if you leave me with her, I swear ——"

"Cross my heart. Go on."

"Where've you been?" said Jo Anne when I got back to her a half hour later, haggard.

I swallowed. "Well, you know, Edwina Moore, how I was dancing with her for a long time?"

"And now you're mad for her and it's all over between us."

"Uh-huh, it's 'cause she's so much prettier'n you," I said wittily and was rewarded with a snuggle. "Listen, Jo Anne. There I was, dancing with her, and all of a sudden she said I didn't have to be stuck with her and she'd go comb her hair and thanked me and all like that." Jo Anne groaned. "But I didn't act mean to her. Jo Anne. I was trying to be nice, really. And I thought it was so nice of her, not to just hang on like old Hallie Beth does and talk you to pieces, it made me feel for her, and so when somebody cut in on me I decided to go hunt up guys to dance with her, and try to make her have a better time."

"And what happened?"

"Well, I got Stan. Then I got Bob to follow him. But then I got in hot water, because when I was trying to talk Horace Ackney into going—what a stinking rat, that Horace Ackney, he wanted me to pay him a quarter—Edwina looked right over where I was at, and I was scared if Horace went, she'd catch on what I'd done, so there wasn't anything to do but go back and cut in on Bob myself, he was starting to roll his eyes around. So there I was, big as life, dancing with her again, and it looked so funny, bouncing back when I'd just got through dancing with her, I had to have some kind of story, and what I said was, 'Edwina, I forgot to ask you when I was dancing with you before, would you go with me to next month's Merrymakers'?'"

"But you're supposed to be going with me."

I was totally unhappy. "I know, Jo Anne. But there'll be hundreds of guys asking you, and it's just for this once."

"I just don't understand it," Jo Anne said.

"Boy, me either! I just couldn't get over it, what she said. I wanted to do something to kind of make up for things. She never acts happy."

Jo Anne nodded and said softly, "Well, with her parents the way they are."

"What way?"

"Oh, they don't get along. I don't know exactly. I've heard my parents talk."

"Are you mad at me, Jo Anne, doing like that?"

"No, I'm not mad. What did Edwina say?"

"When I asked her? Nothing much. She just said, 'Yes, thank you, I'd like to,' and then she piped down and didn't say another thing. She didn't seem real delighted or anything."

Yes, thank you, I'd like to. Then, I supposed, if you were Edwina Moore, you fell silent because you just didn't know how to talk to a green boy you'd known distantly all your life. He'd come bungling up and asked you to a dance a month ahead; probably no one had ever done that before. What should you have done? Make big eyes or say something cute or at least, at the very least, dance cheek to cheek like other girls? Instead, you took the news inside, having been by yourself too much to change and be anything besides alone at a dance. It must be terrible, I imagined, standing unasked on the outskirts of the grins and music; probably you thought about being twenty-five years old and miraculously beautiful—and unhurt.

The dance ended while you were combing your hair in the powder room. Your Cousin Gerry, I was pretty sure, held your velvet coat with a cousin's apathy just too high for you to get your arms in the sleeves. At your front door he grunted and shuffled away down the front walk before you'd even got the key out of your mother's beaded bag.

Other girls, maybe, rushed upstairs to sit at the foot of their parents' beds and chatter about the dance. Your parents were social, beautiful people; I had seen them at wedding receptions. You would feel yourself a discredit to them, stiff, shy, sorry-looking. Though probably they didn't always look so handsome; sometimes they stopped talking when you came into the room, the skin on their faces tight and shrunken with anger. You would have learned by now not to look, to get out of the room, not to think about things you couldn't do anything about. Anyway, you wouldn't go tell about the dance.

As Gerry's car started off in the dark outside, you mutely climbed the stairs. You sat down at the cool mirror in your bedroom and blurred your eyes to see yourself at twenty-five. At the dance your face had burned, your skinny arm on your partner's shoulder felt light and outlandish, as if you had fever. Now you would be calmer; you could feel almost as if the dance had never happened. Now nobody could touch you. I was sure it would never occur to you a boy was lying awake thinking about you.

A month later, Edwina and I sat on straight chairs at one end of the dance floor. Hallie Beth Bosley in vibrating yards and yards of hot red taffeta bore down on us, fists full of oatmeal cookies. "May we sit down next to you-all?" she said, sitting down. She had Horace Ackney with her, a peaked boy with thick glasses behind which his eyes rolled whitely, like those of a terrified horse. Hallie Beth bounced around on her chair, established herself, and began to wolf down oatmeal cookies, in some hazard of biting her hand off at the wrist. "Idn't it a divine dance? Don't you just love it?" she inquired thickly out of a full mouth.

We said it was a very good dance. Horace Ackney declared he didn't think it was as good as the dance before last, though better than last month's, and we batted that around for a while.

"I love your hair that new way," Hallie Beth said to Edwina.

"Thank you, Hallie Beth."

"I mean it. I think it's super. You must be with a pretty special someone tonight." She gave me a brassy smile. Die, Hallie Beth, shrivel up and immediately die, I said with my eyeballs. Where Edwina was looking, I couldn't imagine. Hallie Beth prodded Horace, causing him to spill a few drops of punch. "Listen, y'all. Horace has made up a divine new word. Tell them, Horace."

We all looked at Horace, who waited for perfect silence and then said in a hollow tone, "Repetuous." We recoiled, as if to give him air.

"I just love it," Hallie Beth said. "You see, it's sort of a combination of 'repetitious' and 'impetuous.'"

We pondered. "What do you do with it?" I asked.

"Oh, everything," Hallie Beth cried. "You know. Like you might say, uh, 'a repetuous old houn' dog.' Idn't that right, Horace?"

"Well," said Horace fastidiously, "something like that."

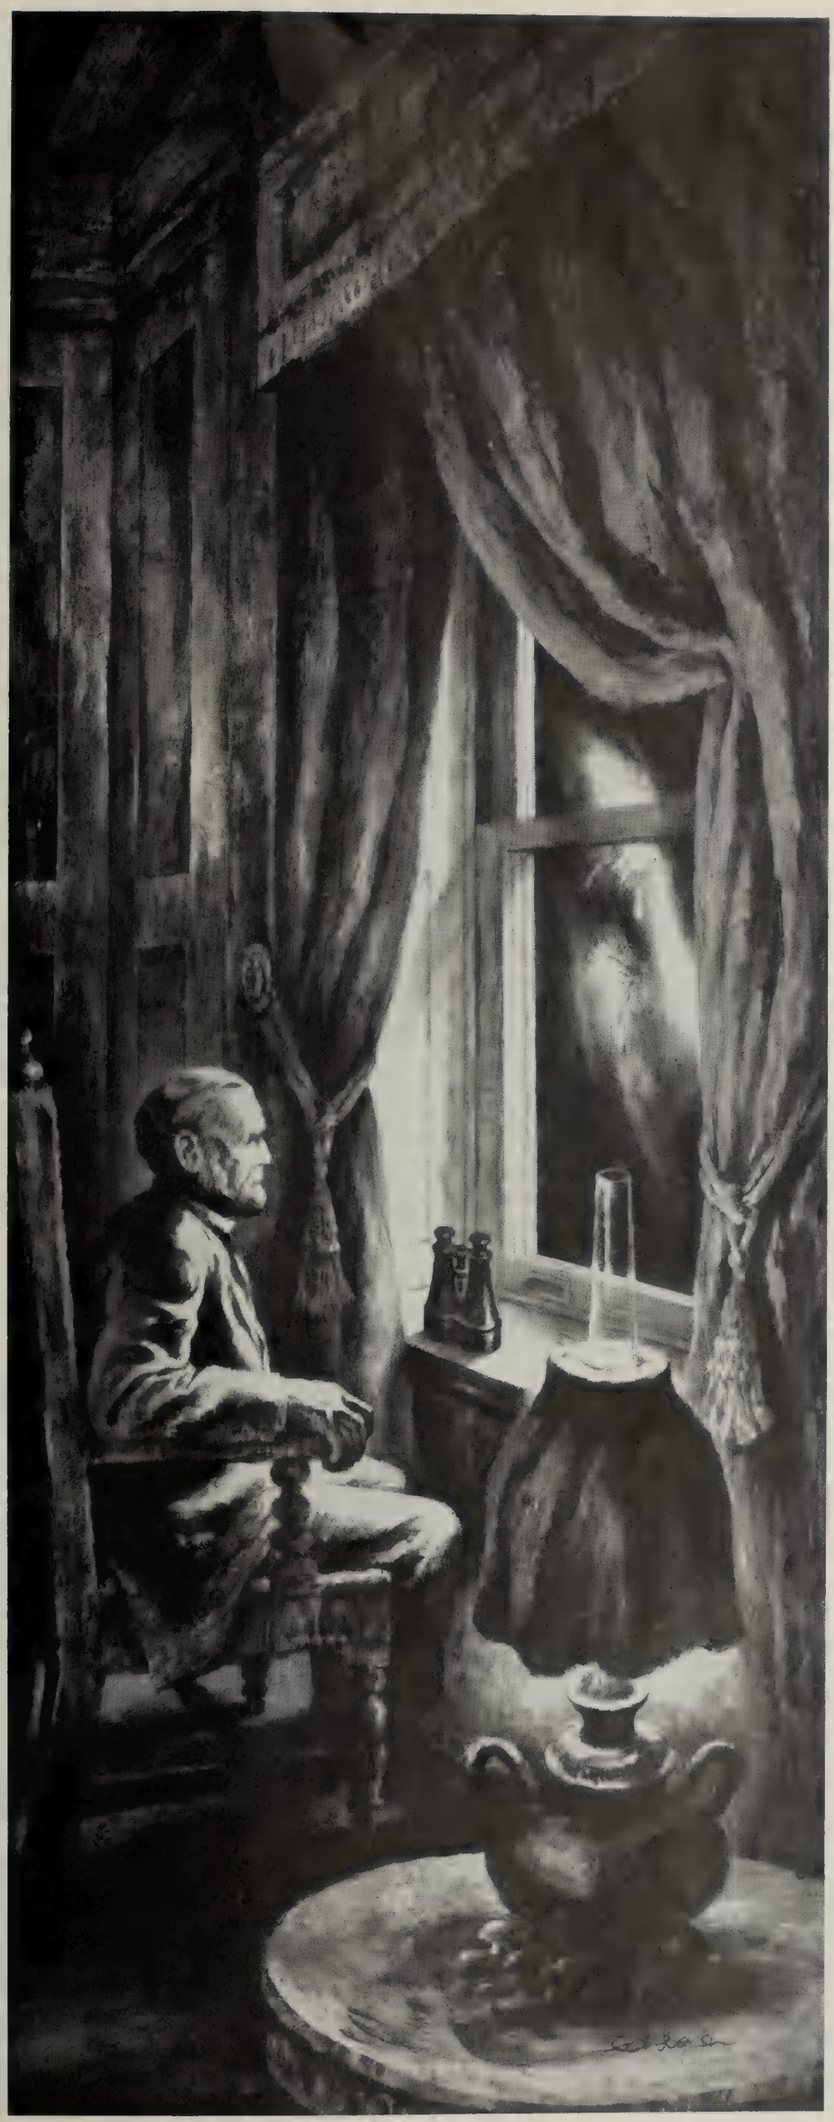
I couldn't stand this Horace. I was a bookworm, too, and concealed it in public like nose picking. Then I would look at Ackney and tremble to realize I was more like him than I was like the football heroes I tagged around with and aped; I hated poor Horace therefore.

Our little conversation ran out of gas. It was always happening. We scrutinized our punch cups. My social instinct inflamed me even to consider shaping sentences around "repetuous," but it didn't come to that, for the music started and I danced Edwina away. I said hopefully, "Are you having a good time?"

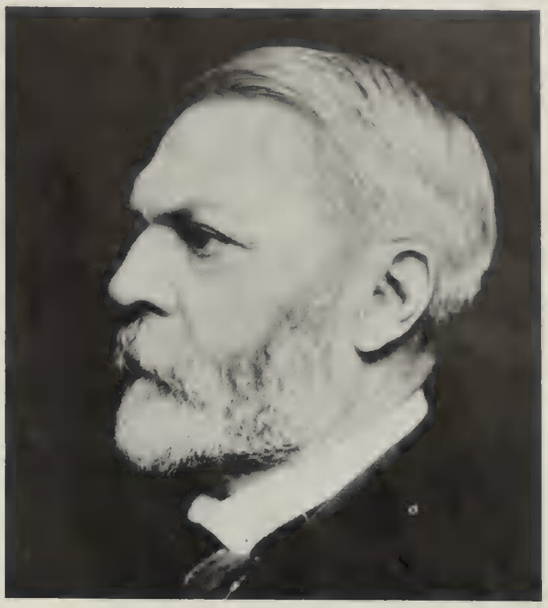
"Oh, yes," Edwina said. Her cheeks were pink; she was nearly pretty. "Are you?"

"Oh, yes," said I extravagantly.

As we revolved, my mind churned. I wanted everything to be nice, everybody football captains and May queens, in a world turning smoothly. When any surface cracked, I felt threatened. Tell me parents didn't love each other, show me somebody like Edwina in pain, and I wanted to plaster over the trouble. The squeamish with their gentle fingers are as cruel as the wholehearted; they only look kinder. I wasn't able to admit to myself how much I wished I'd never seen Edwina.



At home, I'd been cross-examined at the dinner table when the news came out that I wasn't taking Jo Anne to this dance. Jo Anne's father and mother were bridge cronies of my parents; naturally they were interested. "You and Jo Anne had a squabble, eh?" No, dad, no, for pete sake. Well, who was I taking then? It seemed to me parents had no respect for a son's private life. I answered sullenly. So; Ned and Caroline Moore's daughter. My parents exchanged a silence. "Well, I always sorta liked Ned Moore," my father said, in an in-spite-of-everything tone. My mother moved in, ominously neutral, with, "I saw Caroline in the market last week." The air was heavy with opinions unspoken. "Oh, now, Caroline's all right," my father said, with more warmth than he'd shown when he said he liked Mr. Moore, and plainly disagreeing with whatever way my mother had seen Mrs. Moore in the grocery. Why wouldn't parents say? I peered back and forth. "Um," my mother concluded the duet.



Tonight I had been shown into a warm library. There were sets of Thackeray and Gibbon; a line of Heritage Press books caught my eye; my fingers itched to take them down and feel the creamy laid paper and florid bindings. But I made urbane conversation with Mr. Moore. I thought he was the most handsome man I'd ever seen; he was lean and gray, furnished with a glass of brandy and a garnet satin smoking jacket. This was the way to live, it seemed to me. I bet myself the Moores ate dinner by candlelight and spoke intricate sentences in soft voices, entirely unlike our slapdash suppers after which my father snoozed on the living-room couch in sock feet and cigar ash. Could such people be unhappy?

Mr. Moore asked after my parents. I said they were just fine. "Did your mother ever tell you I was one of her beaux in college?" I said politely, no, she certainly hadn't. "Oh, yes, yes. Lot of water under the bridge since then. Well, we marry and lose track. I sometimes sit and think, what if I'd married your mother? She was one of the prettiest girls of 'em all, did you know that?"

"No, sir," I whispered, incredulous. Our conversation was beginning to seem pretty unsuitable to me.

The man who wouldn't give up

500 MASSED ROCKETS shook the brand-new Brooklyn Bridge, screamed up into the May evening and showered the city with red and gold.

While behind a darkened window, a big, gaunt man sat and watched, too crippled and painwracked to attend the opening day festivities for the bridge.

This was a pity, for he had built it.

Which means that when money gave out, Chief Engineer Roebling pleaded for more. When disturbing changes of plan had to be made, Roebling fought them through. And when a hundred panicked men were trapped under the East River in a flooded caisson, Roebling saved them.

Spinning the giant steel spiderweb not only exacted 13 years of Roebling's life, from 1870 to 1883, but very early in the game it crippled him forever with the caisson disease.

But he never gave up, saw the job through to the end. His were the courage, skill and vision that make Americans a nation of great builders—a strong, growing nation. And a nation whose Savings Bonds rank with the world's finest investments.

"And now," he said darkly, "now Martha's son is taking my little girl to a dance." I didn't think I ought to bring it up about my mother's name being Margaret. We were interrupted by rustling on the stairs, and I jumped up in guilty confusion as Edwina and her mother came into the room. I helped Edwina into her velvet coat and promised to have her home early.

I hadn't ever entertained the idea before of parents' having been anybody before they were married. Now, as I danced with Mr. Moore's voice in my ear, the lawn on which my own home stood seemed to tremble and crack. I tried to think it out. Suppose Mr. Moore had married my mother? Then my father would be wandering off in some limbo I couldn't imagine, married to—whom? Then who would I be, or would I at all? And what if my parents' parents had never married? It seemed that I existed only by the shakiest chance, and if the planks of the dance floor had split apart just then, I felt there was no sure ground underneath. We could plunge through, and then down, down, and go out like matches dropped in the dark.

I entered the Paul Jones, where the girls, hand in hand, moved in an inner circle facing an outer ring of boys passing the opposite way. To me, it was a drifting of specters. The music broke, the circles stopped, I stepped up to my partner.

Jo Anne's fingers brought me back to life. "I thought you weren't going to dance with me at all," she said. "What's the matter?"

"Nothing. I've just been goofing off. Which dance is this?"

"Ninth, silly. The dance is almost over." She pressed my hand. "Tell me what's the matter."

I said, "Listen, Jo Anne, what does it mean when you feel like you could just fade out and not be anybody? Do you ever feel like that? Like if somebody stuck a knife in somebody next to me, that would hurt, but if they stuck me, there wouldn't be anybody there. What is that, feeling like everybody except me? I wish it would quit."

Jo Anne solved this poser very simply. She said, "I don't know, honey. They're playing our song," and, glancing around to check the chaperons, she kissed me deftly on the neck. We silently pressed our faces together; she smelled of sweet powder and soap. As we turned in reverent circles, the orchestra slowly poured Squeeze Me But Please Don't Tease Me over us like warm maple sirup.

I looked down at my fingers laced in Jo Anne's and found something new to worry about, more concrete this time. I was afraid she might look at my left wrist and misunderstand. But she didn't notice. The music stopped, and we separated in happy agony. The trumpets blasted a fanfare announcing the last dance, and Horace Ackney, who must have been maneuvering Edwina near me, dumped her at my side and fled. Jo Anne was charming to Edwina; she envied Edwina's dress, she said; she looked around for her own partner and thanked me impersonally for our dance, as if the orchestra had just been playing any old song. She went quickly away. How pretty she was, what secrecy, what resources of rich tact and sureness! If Jo Anne wore my identification bracelet, I felt, I probably existed.

It was the custom at the Merrymakers' to turn the lights out for the last dance, while we wallowed in warm darkness to Goodnight, Sweetheart. It was a boon to the tongue-tied, like me.

"Do you?" a girl would murmur.

"Do I what?"

"You know."

"Oh. Sure."

"Well, say it."

"I"—swallow—"love you." I could never, in bright light.

With Edwina, no message to whisper to her and no agreement of touch, I felt huge discomfort. She applied her forehead to my cheek, the first time she had danced like that; we clung together and waded in. We fitted together badly; she was tall for me and I had to crick my neck. Clasped couples near us mumbled. I felt I should say something to break the silence of our embarrassed bodies, but I didn't like to boom in her ear, "It's been an awfully good dance, hasn't it?" and I couldn't think of a single other thing to say, to Edwina.

We danced on. I began to perspire. I could feel my cheek dampening her smooth forehead, but I hadn't the courage to remove it. I clung fiercely and Edwina, too, tightened her grip; cringing intimately, we suffered the grief of being jolted by another couple and feeling our mutual skin slip softly, with a tiny wet noise. After the slight shift of position, I found myself with my nose in Edwina's hair; when I inhaled, a wisp of it entered my left nostril; when I breathed out, it fluttered free, but next time it came to stay. The saxophones groaned on. I held my breath, and went through the rudiments of the fox trot like a man faintly performing the Australian crawl on his way to the bottom. My mind was taken up with wondering which would come first, my sneeze or the end of the music. They were simultaneous, as it turned out. The song stopped, I exploded, the lights flashed on, and everybody began to tear down the balloons.

"I had an awfully nice time," Edwina said. We faced each other across a black-topped table in a sandwich shop, finishing our waffles and milk. Edwina leaned her elbows on the table and then, mortified, painfully corrected them to her sides.

"Aw, look, put your elbows on the table all you want to," I said recklessly. "I'm no tattletale."

Edwina looked as if I'd hit her, and I was scared myself. Evidently I looked even more shocked than she did, for I saw her peep out from behind her own embarrassment at mine. With a heartbreaking smile, she leaned forward and propped her thin arms on the table. It was a proud moment in my life, for it was the first time I ever said the right thing. Edwina, released and emboldened, looked right at me. She said, "I hate dances. I get sick in the girls' room. I've never told anybody that before."

"You mean—really sick?"

"Really sick," she said.

We sat and thought it over. I wanted to tell her how proud I was that she should have told me this secret; I longed to say, too, that I thought she looked pretty now, and that she wouldn't always be shy and unpopular. But I was no hero. I just looked at her, and our glances began to waver. Slowly, inexorably, like coach back into pumpkin, ball gown to rags, we faded back into torment. We looked down at the table and blinked and suffered.

Then I reached with my left hand for the check which lay on the top of the napkin dispenser. As I did, my black sleeve slid back from my wrist, and Edwina made a little sound. I looked at her and saw her stare at my wrist and then up at me.

She blurted out, "But I didn't know you and Jo Anne were broken up. I thought you and Jo Anne ——"

"Edwina, I ——" As before, I felt I couldn't stand the sight of her pain, I must say anything to make it stop, but I just couldn't speak. She blushed dark red. "It's none of my bus ness. I didn't mean to say anything. It w just the surprise." She ducked her head a began to fight into the sleeves of her coat. jumped up to help her and then scamper away to the cashier's desk.

In my father's car, I turned the radio o and drove the few blocks to Edwina's hou with such elaborate attention to the music a not having a wreck that, "There's my driv way," Edwina said. "You've missed my driv way." I turned in and came to a stop on t gravel. I began to breathe quickly. Witho looking at Edwina, I jumped out and r around to her side. She rustled out beside m

My ey popped open in bright, dolly surprise a stared into two equally amazed ones careeri away from mine. We backed apart and sto in a pool of embarrassment, under the glo ing porch light. There was one thing I had to say quick "Edwina, about the bracelet. Jo Anne a me—I mean, I just thought it would be m polite to take it off just for this evening." I didn't say it. If I'd started talking I wo have stood there apologizing all night; an couldn't see any use in saying, "I meant to nice," when underneath I felt chicken a cruel. I didn't want to be saddled w Edwina. MOTHERS OF TWINS HAVE TO FIND SHORT CUTS!

babies, too, if a mother has other children and duties that crowd her day.

The daily bath loomed as a big hurdle to most mothers of twins. When added to all the other jobs, it seemed to use up a large chunk of the day. Even worse was the likelihood that one or both babies would be screaming with hunger long before they could be fed. (The mothers had to make absolutely sure, before starting, that every bit of bath equipment and clean clothing was close at hand, that two bottles were warming and that cribs were ready. Doesn't it make the care of a single baby seem peaceful?)

The mothers resourcefully came to various solutions: two separate baths at different unconventional hours; bath for two in the evening with the father giving one; two baths in the same bath water (they were needlessly guilty about that); a bath for each baby every other day or even less frequently, with careful cleaning of the face and diaper region between times.

Two solutions that strike me as worth considering for a single baby are the evening bath—before the 6 P.M. or 10 P.M. feeding—for the benefit of a father who'd love to take part, and the less-frequent tub bath for the benefit of the very busy mother or the inexperienced mother who's still apprehensive. A baby's skin needs to be kept clean, all right, but it can be done just as well with a wet washcloth used carefully as it can with gallons of water. A baby with average skin needs a mildly soaped washing of his diaper region daily, of his body, limbs, neck and outside ears every two or three days (more often in hot weather than cold), of his scalp once or twice a week (sooner if he gets spat-up milk in his hair). An excessive amount of soap is only that much more trouble to remove in the rinsing. The soap can be wiped off the body with two wipings with a washcloth wrung out in water that's not too soapy. The care used in this rinsing will depend on how sensitive the baby's skin is. The face should be wiped with a wet, unsoaped washcloth daily.

The main thing lost in omitting the tub bath is the fun for baby and mother. But most mothers of young twins felt it was no fun at all.

Mothers of twins dwell heavily on the subject of help—as well they might. Twins are often premature, and if so they usually require three-hour feedings, feedings that are apt to take longer than those of a husky full-term baby. This means that approximately one out of every three hours is devoted to feedings, or eight out of the twenty-four. Add to that the preparation of formula (fourteen to sixteen bottles), the washing and folding of mountains of diapers, baths, and you reach a formidable total before you make any allowance for care of other children, husband, self and house. Some of the kinds of help they seized on through desperation might well be utilized by mothers of single-borns who are snowed under because of inexperience or large families: a comfortable neighbor who enjoys coming in daily for a few weeks to give one feeding while the mother naps or catches up on other chores; a high-school girl in the late afternoons; a cleaning woman once or twice a week for a month or two. Several mothers were amazed to realize how much assistance with the twins they got from a daughter as young as three years old. Many mothers testified that their husbands had risen magnificently to the emergency, not only in such matters as giving alternate feedings at night (or giving all the night feedings every other night), giving baths, preparing formula, cooking meals, acting as sitter one night a week while the mother stepped out, but—even more importantly—in giving solid moral support in the forms of patience, appreciation and affection. These mothers made you realize again how important a father can be in child rearing.

Last but not least I want to discuss the subject of feeding schedules—regular versus demand. A few mothers of twins found that a modified demand schedule worked well. They fed the first baby when he waked and then promptly waked the second. But the overwhelming majority—even those who had been enthusiastic about demand scheduling from experience with previous babies or from theoretical conviction—quickly decided after one or two days' experience with twins that they couldn't afford the luxury of irregular feedings. It seemed as though they were feeding all day and all night, with no assurance that they could plan a half hour for some other job. And the impressive thing was that though they were often dealing with small babies (who are apt to have more trouble lasting a set three hours between feedings, more trouble taking a sufficient amount every feeding), the mothers found that in a surprisingly few days they were able to get both twins quite regularly scheduled, without much distress to the twins or the mothers.

A fair number of mothers did have to compromise for a few days, stalling with pacifiers, putting up with short periods of fussing. Some of these off-schedule wakings ended with the baby's going back to sleep, others ended with the baby's having to be fed early. But the mothers became a little stricter each day and the babies' digestive systems followed the mothers' lead and soon developed the habit of getting hungry by the clock.

I've always felt that it was important—for both mother and baby—that a mother be willing to accommodate the feeding schedule to the baby's needs in the early days and weeks of life so that the baby wouldn't have to cry for long periods and so that the mother wouldn't have to suffer and sweat listening to him cry.

But I have also always felt that the aim should be to get to a sensible schedule as soon as it is comfortable, a schedule that suits the infant and the rest of the family too. I don't mean that all feedings should necessarily be four hours apart. It suits some babies and mothers even better to have, for instance, a three-hour interval at one time of day and a five-hour interval at another. It's simply that 99 per cent of families can function more efficiently and happily if they know what to expect.

A majority of babies seem to be ready for regularity almost from birth. If their mothers wake them by the clock for a few days, the babies soon act as though they had clocks in their stomachs. A minority can't adapt that fast. There are the ones who are poor feeders at first, who can't always take enough to last them for four hours. There are the restless sleepers who fret as soon as they wake, and there are the others who alternate periods of deep sleep, from which they can't be sufficiently waked to feed, with periods of frequent hungry waking. But most of these irregular babies can be straightened out within a month if the mother exerts gentle guidance. The baby with severe colic or regular irritable crying may have to be fed off schedule at his unhappy time of day for as long as three months. Any baby—even the most regular—will occasionally wake early, with obvious hunger, and it's a sensible mother who accommodates him.

But I confess I always feel impatient when a mother says "I believe in self-demand" in a tone of voice that suggests she will be proud if her baby remains completely irregular for a number of months. It's as if she believes there is some superiority in irregularity. To be sure, there's no harm to a baby in long-continued irregularity of schedule. The main risk is that if parents too earnestly take the attitude "Let's encourage the baby to set the pace and we'll follow happily" it may spread to other aspects of child care. Then the result is apt to be a somewhat spoiled child and resentful parents.

Perhaps I'm being too crotchety in harping on the needlessness of excessive permissiveness in scheduling, but I feel justified by these stories of twins.

Flexible schedules and discussion of self-demand are so widespread nowadays that some inexperienced parents get the idea that it's old-fashioned cruelty to try to get a baby on a schedule. But if 95 per cent of mothers of twins can do it in a couple of weeks, it can't be that bad.

Although he cannot answer letters personally, Dr. Spock will be glad to hear from readers and will discuss in these pages problems of general interest.—Ed.

The MYSTERIOUS DISEASE of WEAKNESS

You may not be able to open your eyes, fill your lungs, smile, or make your arm reach the medicine you need, inches away.

By RONALD M. DEUTSCH

For ten years the woman had lain in bed in a strange limp paralysis. Her limbs moved rarely. She was barely able to swallow. Her weight had fallen forty pounds.

Yet the usual laboratory tests indicated that she was healthy. For a time a psychiatrist had been certain that she suffered from hysteria. But his doubts had grown until he'd withdrawn from the case. Her family doctor had scoured medical texts, brought specialists, come again and again with new ideas, new hope, new disappointment.

Once more the doctor had a new possibility. Now he filled a hypodermic, pressed the needle into the muscle of her left arm. Then he moved to a second prepared needle. The drug he had given could act quickly and dangerously, and an antidote must be ready.

They waited—four minutes, five, six. Slowly the woman's hand lifted to her face and brushed across her eyes, which opened wide. Her shoulders began to stir. In ten minutes she was sitting up on the edge of her bed. Then she stood, raised her arm, walked. For the first time in ten years she spoke clearly, until her voice choked with relief and with tears.

The doctor picked up the case record, on which his first note was dated April 4, 1943. On it he wrote, "June 26, 1953. Diagnosis: Myasthenia Gravis."

Unfortunately, the diagnosis and the dramatic relief were not the end of this story. Myasthenia gravis is relentless. Within two hours the symptoms were returning.

The left eyelid began to droop, then the right. From time to time the woman saw double. She stumbled and nearly fell as her legs refused to obey, and when she spoke her voice drifted into the high, nasal tones that are one of the hallmarks of myasthenia. She tried to drink a glass of water, and almost choked as her throat muscles refused to swallow. Then before her weak hand could reach the night stand, the glass fell from her grasp.

A name had been found—and with it the knowledge that there was no certain cure, only moments of relief, painstakingly made to overlap and form the semblance of a normal life. But with the name came the small comfort that this woman was not alone.

Myasthenia gravis has been known for hundreds of years, but only recently have most doctors learned to know it when they see the first symptoms and offer help to its victims.

Less than four years ago Jane Ellsworth, mother of a myasthenic daughter, began to form the MG Foundation. Doctors now guess that, diagnosed and undiagnosed, there are between 50,000 and 100,000 myasthenics in the U. S. alone. It seems, too, that myasthenia gravis occurs more frequently in young women and older men. Accurate estimates are made difficult by the fact that mild cases of myasthenia gravis may resemble chronic fatigue and by the fact that many overworked doctors have not been made aware of all the latest facts on the disease. Recent medical papers, however, from such faraway places as Russia and China indicate that consciousness of it is becoming world-wide.

But while the number of known cases has grown, hope has grown too. Twenty years ago 80 to 90 per cent of all myasthenics died in the first few years of the disease. Now eight or nine of every ten myasthenics live!

What is this mystery disease, and what can be done to fight it?

"Myasthenia gravis," explains a doctor, "might be called a breakdown in communications. The brain sends a message through a healthy nerve to a healthy muscle. But at the point at which nerve and muscle meet, something goes wrong. The message gets through to the muscle, but weakly. Then with each succeeding impulse the muscle response gets weaker and weaker, until it disappears."

The problem lies in the so-called striated muscles, any or all of which may be affected by myasthenia. The muscles are those of the eyes, of the tongue and the jaw, of the throat, the limbs, those of the chest that let you breathe.

So you may not be able to walk, or talk, or even let food or air pass your throat. You may not be able to open your eyes, fill your lungs, smile or make your arm reach the medicine you need, inches away. Many other muscles can be affected. In a mild case, one eyelid may droop and there may be difficulty in walking or climbing stairs. In severe cases, patients lie in bed, inert, totally helpless.

It is easy to see how this disease can mean a broken life, which is still the fate of some patients. It might be true of nearly all, if it were not for the work of Mary Walker.

A physician at St. Alfege's Hospital in London, Doctor Walker was not a specialist or researcher. But in the spring of 1934 she was confronted by a puzzling case, which she diagnosed as myasthenia, the "rare" disease of muscle weakness. Doctor Walker studied her patient until she began to believe that there was a parallel to the bewildering symptoms of curare poisoning.

This poison—used by the Amazon natives to tip their arrows—which seems to cripple the nervous system, had an antidote, a drug called physostigmine. If, Doctor Walker reasoned, myasthenia were caused by some bodily poison that resembled curare, might not this poison, too, respond to physostigmine?

Doctor Walker asked her specialist colleagues. Their answer was a flat no. It was too dangerous to try, they said. The whole idea was a series of unproved assumptions.

But Doctor Walker injected the physostigmine. The results are medical history. The life-supporting drug for myasthenia gravis had been found.

A form of Mary Walker's drug is known as neostigmine (Prostigmin) and about 75 per cent of all myasthenia-gravis sufferers take it regularly. Other patients take it and two later drugs, Mestinon and ambenonium (formerly called Mysuran), in various combinations. The dosage of these drugs varies considerably among patients, and the amount a patient requires often varies daily. Fortunately, Prostigmin almost ver wears out its welcome. One patient eded and successfully took 450 pills a day, t one milligram of this powerful drug when ected will make a healthy person violently ill. Before 1934 the search for diagnosis was ually fruitless for most patients. They were d they were emotionally disturbed, brain-maged, that they had diseases of the throat, the eyes, of the lungs, of the limbs, of the art. Unfortunately, many of these same mis-kes are still being made.

Currently a six-month to five-year hunt for ief is common. Ten or twenty handicapped, en bedridden years have gone by for a dis-aying number. Just recently the MG Foun-tion learned of a California man who had ited forty years for diagnosis!

Once suspected, the diagnosis for myas-enia gravis is relatively simple. It leaves little om for doubt. Until recently, it amounted a simple injection of neostigmine. If the tient responded well in fifteen or twenty nutes, he undoubtedly had the disease. A ent drug improvement, called Tensilon, en intravenously, is even quicker and surer.

Midge Furnish is a pretty young brunette in mid-twenties, wife of a doctor, mother of ee children. After a very healthy, energetic ly life, she developed myasthenia five years . Largely because of her family medical , Midge was diagnosed quickly, in a few nths. She began to take neostigmine.

"I started out on fifteen pills a day," says dge. "You take them every one to three rs, day and night. A severe myasthenic st break his sleep. If you go too long with-pills, you may not have the strength to llow them, even to call for help.

"In an hour or two the symptoms slip back. u have to time it just right to make sure you er get too weak. You plan all the time. You the pills half an hour before you eat or k, so you won't choke. You time the pills re you go to the doctor, or start to bathe baby, or even change him.

"ven with all the pills, your strength isn't mal. Use a muscle and it wears out. Brush r teeth—usually with two hands—and 've barely the strength to comb your hair. start to iron, and then slowly your arm sn't respond. It just stays there, and the begins to burn the cloth, and you just t move it.

"And there's a limit to the neostigmine you stand. Take a few too many and you get l stomach cramps and breaking out in a t, and your innards seeming to go to s. They're really something, those side ts. You can stop them by taking a drug d atropine. But the side effects are warn-ignals too. Mask them and you can take a o much neostigmine and end up in crisis."

risis is the dread of the myasthenic, for it sis that kills. There are two kinds. Myas-ic crisis is the normal crisis of the disease, bnormal weakness of muscles you must o live, muscles to keep fluid out of your ; and stave off pneumonia, muscles to open the air passages, muscles to draw to your lungs.

The second type is cholinergic crisis, which is the result of an overdose of the very drug that helps the myasthenic. Even trained physicians are hard put to tell the difference between this and myasthenic crisis. But the difference is crucial. For treatment must be given quickly if the patient is to live. The slightest misstep can tilt the balance between life and death. And the treatment for one crisis is the exact opposite of the treatment for the other. It is for this reason that doctors hail the new diagnostic drug, Tensilon.

Records indicate that pregnancy causes remissions in one third of the cases. In another third, nothing happens; and with the final third, the patient may get worse. When asked, all the doctors specializing in myasthenia agreed that, in all cases, their advice is for pregnancy.

They give this advice in spite of the fact that about 12 per cent of all myasthenic mothers give birth to babies with the general condition called transient myasthenia. Fortunately, this responds to small doses of neostigmine immediately.

The cost of either Prostigmin or Mestinon can amount to as much as $50 or $60 every week. Since they are lifesaving, the patient cannot stint. The Myasthenia Gravis Foundation is studying ways to make pills available free to those who cannot afford them. Two hospitals at least, Mount Sinai and Massachusetts General, will not dismiss myasthenia-gravis patients without a free supply of 1000 pills. Many city welfare agencies will dispense the pills free for needy patients. But myasthenia gravis remains an expensive disease. The search for a cure is going on at an accelerated rate.

The treatment and research centers are increasing in number—at Presbyterian and Mt. Sinai Hospitals in New York, at Massachusetts General (where the first clinic for myasthenia was established in 1935), at the University of Indiana in Indianapolis, Johns Hopkins, the Mayo Clinic, the University of California in Berkeley and Los Angeles. And new facts about myasthenia are coming to light.

Most doctors now accept some form of what is called the "circulating substance theory," the idea that some substance circulates in the body to incapacitate the nerve-muscle junctions. The idea was Mary Walker's.

Researchers are now hunting the "circulating substance." It seems highly possible that it lies somewhere in an imbalance of the hormone (or endocrine) system. This would seem likely from its relation to pregnancy and to the thymus gland. For instance, Sloan-Kettering, the cancer-research center, and Mt. Sinai have found that sufferers from myasthenia gravis have a significant decrease in hormone secretion. This has not yet been confirmed by others. Researchers hope, however, to make important discoveries in this area.

How close are such discoveries? No one knows, but new information is being gathered all the time.

In the meantime, drugs are not the only hope for myasthenics. Another kind of treatment is being tried, but as yet no one is certain just how effective it is. That treatment is thymectomy, the removal of the thymus gland.

Analyzing the reports of such operations, Drs. Lee M. Eaton and O. Theron Clagett, of the Mayo Clinic, concluded, "We approve of thymectomy in the case of female patients, particularly if they are young, in spite of the fact that surgery in severe degrees of myasthenia gravis is of great risk to the patient. . . . The value of thymectomy in male patients has not been demonstrated conclusively up to the present time."

Two major clinics, however, doubt the effect of thymectomy on any myasthenic, as it is such a changeable disease.

As in every other aspect of myasthenia, there are no hard-and-fast rules about thymectomy. In general, the need for surgery is determined by the severity of the case. One young man in California began to weaken as neostigmine lost its effectiveness for him. "I couldn't see much point in living the way I was," he says, "spoon-fed, flat on my back, dependent for everything on other people's strength." One doctor suggested thymectomy as a desperation measure. Another warned that it was far too dangerous, and had a very small chance of success. The young man was determined. He lived through the operation and in three months he was doing well on ten or fifteen pills a day. He works an eight-hour day on his feet, running a complex computer, and since his wife also has a job, helps her with the housework on weekends. It is possible, however, that this man experienced a natural remission.

There are certain elements in American civilization which as a European I find it hard to understand. American children and adolescents are accorded a licence without bond or bound. Almost as incomprehensible are the petting, date-seeking boys and girls of the universities and colleges.

X-ray therapy has also been tried but without conclusive results. X ray is imperative, however, for diagnosing the tumors of the thymus gland that often occur along with MG.

So far, all the experiments are gropings, in a sense, in a field that is large and relatively unfamiliar. Doctors do not yet know exactly how the muscles and nerves work. In the past few years long strides have been taken by specialists in the subject. Research in myasthenia has its effect on illnesses such as muscular dystrophy and multiple sclerosis. In the long run it may help doctors with the problems of fatigue, of muscle pains and weaknesses and some nervous disorders. But, meanwhile, the simple fact is that too few doctors are aware of the commonness of the malady. "When you are thinking of myasthenia," says Dr. Augustus Rose, the neurologist who directs the myasthenia treatment center at UCLA, "it is actually a very easy diagnosis to make. One problem in myasthenia is the necessity of creating that alertness, that watchfulness for the disease."

There is need for medical awareness even after the disease has been diagnosed. "Even medical people who know of the disease don't know the details of care," says Pat Ellsworth, whose mother founded the MG Foundation. "A few years ago I was in a hospital for cortisone therapy (which didn't prove very helpful to myasthenics) and they took away my neostigmine as part of the treatment.

"Take away the neostigmine from a seriously ill myasthenic and he's helpless. My nurse didn't realize that. She turned me on my back for the night. I was too weak to move myself. When I tried to signal her that I had to be on my side to sleep, I couldn't even speak. She turned out the light and left. I tried to reach the buzzer and couldn't. I just lay there all night, hoping I wouldn't choke, hoping I would make it till the morning nurse came in."

"My doctor diagnosed my case all right," says a Chicago woman, "but he had never heard of the right dosage for neostigmine. He put me on two tablets a day. I could do none of the housework—and the expense of help kept us strapped. This went on for four years.

"Then I wrote to the Foundation, heard about how many pills other myasthenics were taking. I asked my doctor to talk to their doctors and he put me on demand dosage. Now I can manage the house and prepare meals. We're solvent and I feel like a human being again."

There are medical reasons for spreading the information about myasthenia gravis—but there are less tangible reasons as well. "Myasthenia gravis has such a frightening sound, so mysterious," says one executive who has the disease, "that I've stopped mentioning the name. People react as if this were some horrible contagious disease. I've got tired of reassuring people that I won't infect their children. At least I wish people would realize that myasthenia is no more contagious than a broken arm."

Says Jane Ellsworth, of the Foundation, "The doctors tell us that among all the major unconquered illnesses, myasthenia is one of the most likely to be overcome. The research has been mapped out. It looks, too, as if, when the solution comes, there will be no expensive rehabilitation program. The muscles and nerves are sound. They only need to be freed from whatever is inhibiting them. Meanwhile, we're doing what we can to make patients' lives less painful, more meaningful."

The headquarters of the Myasthenia Gravis Foundation are at 2 East 103rd Street, New York 29, N.Y. They are in touch with local chapters of the organization and would welcome the names of those suffering from the disease. Further information about myasthenia gravis may be obtained from them. Contributions, of course, will also be welcomed.

e notion that mechanization is "labor-g" thus proves illusory. In the over-all it is obviously so. Technology consumes voraciously, creating more and more ." But it is illusory in the more intimate On the farm it saves "labor" only by tuting manpower. The farmer himself s no shorter or less-strenuous hours. He not have more "time." On the contrary, today driven as never before to "make y."

o the technical progress that his farm rep-s enters, therefore, an element of pres-and anxiety that was not there in the of Grandma Moses. The old self-suffi-armer, who grew to feed his family and ls abundantly, locally marketing and g in the surplus, was rich by virtue of the ity of his external needs. If he had a er crop and much surplus, it was a year. But whether the farm yielded more or less was not a matter of life or death. When it yielded less, it meant that Mary wouldn't have a new dress that year, or Harry a new suit. It did not mean calamity. Now it can mean just that. For the new farmer is part of the enormous apparatus created by technology which enters every phase of production and distribution. In fact, he is not a farmer in the ancient sense of the word. He is a businessman. He must study the market, keep books on every cow and hen, and pay ever-increasing taxes even on his personal property, his cattle and equipment. For in the motor age, roads that could be negotiated by horses defy a jeep. The needs of the community perpetually increase.

The community of closely knit families is also breaking up. Its sons, even if they still live at home, go off to work in factories, sometimes forty miles away, for the high wages with which only the richest farmers can compete. Its daughters are no longer amused by Grange dances, church festivals and village picnics. They train themselves as stenographers, nurses or bookkeepers, and go to the larger towns, or, if untrained, they work in the town's shops and stores, delight in the movies, and marry boys from the town. Their parents seldom have the joy of seeing their grown children and their grandchildren at the family board, and being able to say of the son-in-law, "Your dad was my best friend," or of the daughter-in-law, "You were a cute kid." The families are scattered, the in-laws are strangers, the village is a diminishing suburb of a larger town, and the drift is from village to town to city from where the life of the village and farm, the products they buy, the markets they supply and the conditions of their work are ever increasingly controlled.

Few wish to change this, and none who do can. The great technological revolution has brought a vast increase of material consumption. But it has brought in its train neither greater freedom nor security nor inner satisfaction.

Its inexorable trend is to collectivize and control the whole of economic and social life. It weeds out the "incompetent," meaning those incompetent to adjust to its demands. For autonomous man, the man whole in himself, it has no use. Its ideal is the perfectly functioning machine, in which the parts (though they be men and not pieces of steel) are subservient to the whole operation and the operation sufficient unto its own purpose. Its promise is an ever-greater shower of goods to be consumed—and goods that must be consumed if the process is not to break down. It fulfills this promise, but only at a price.

The price is the world of Grandma Moses: free, laborious, poor, but yet abundant.

CAN LOVE BE LEARNED?

JUDGE POLIER: I'm afraid that I don't feel the having or not having money should ever be the touchstone for preventing or making anything possible in life. I don't feel it for my own children and I can't feel that it should be so for other people's children.

DR. ADAMS: It should be noted, however, that generally speaking, among young people under age twenty who marry, the divorce rate is decidedly higher than for people who wait until ages twenty-six or twenty-seven to get married. The young marriage is exposed to so many pressures, including in-law pressures, well meaning though they may be, that it would seem to me that subsidies from some neutral source might be better than money from home. After all, the Government subsidizes aviation and railroads and veterans' housing. Why not marriage?

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: But wouldn't Government subsidies encourage irresponsibility and make marriage too easy?

DR. ADAMS: Quite the contrary, I think. If the proper standards were set up, subsidies would actually encourage responsible marriages—and discourage irresponsible ones. The application time for the subsidy might be six months, for instance, and qualifications should involve at least three things: public announcement of the engagement, the waiting period, and instruction on handling the responsibilities and privileges of marriage. Suitable marriages would then be underwritten against such circumstantial catastrophes as sudden illness, poor housing and heavy education costs, while passing romances without serious intentions would fail to qualify.

As for subsidies' encouraging people to marry even younger than they do now—well, the average age of marriage for a girl has been moving downward since 1890 until now it is about twenty. I expect it soon to reach nineteen—and although a depression might slow this trend up, I do not expect anything to halt it entirely.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Let's go back now to the question of the effects and causes of the troubled marriage. Dr. Pearson?

DR. PEARSON: Well, we have talked about the emotional and sociological effects, but there is also a medical effect. If people are living in a stressful environment in which they are continually in turmoil, it will affect directly the health of a number of organs in the body. Stomach ulcers, some skin diseases, heart palpitations, as well as many other ills, are directly affected by emotional stress. There are also many feminine complaints that have an emotional background which is in direct relationship to the happiness or lack of happiness in the home.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Dr. Fromm, would you like to add something about mental health to that?

DR. FROMM: We are on a two-way street here. There is the effect of the bad marriage upon mental health, but primarily it's the effect of the bad mental health upon marriage that is important.

But what I would really like to add here is something that may sound very primitive. I think the cause of failure in marriage is failure in the capacity to love, or, if you prefer, the capacity to live.

I would say that our society in general prepares people for everything else but love. People are brought up generally to value money, power, success, and the ability to buy and consume is viewed as a major thing in life. The ability to love is not, of course, a subject that can be taught in the same sense that such a subject as mathematics can be taught, yet it can be taught to some extent, as I tried to show in my latest book, The Art of Loving. Beyond that it is something that can be enjoyed by truly loving persons—the kind of person who not only loves his wife, or husband, but who also loves children, all children, people, everybody.

You find that if you ask people today, "Have you ever seen anybody who loved someone else really?" and you don't mean love in a superficial, conventional sense, you will often find that people who are honest will say, after some reflection, "No, never."

DR. ADAMS: It is true that the happy, loving marriage is exceedingly rare. I doubt very much if more than one in five marriages can be called really happy—and even that estimate may be too high.

But we must not overlook the many workable, successful marriages in which two people live together out of habit, sharing their efforts, with some sort of friendly adjustment to each other.

In either type of marriage, however, I would say that the one single major cause of marriage failure is the emotional immaturity of either the husband or the wife or both—and usually it is both, because an emotionally crippled person tends to be more likely to marry a weak person than a strong one.

Maturity can be generally defined as thinking, talking, behaving like an adult instead of a child. But more precisely I would say that the individual ready for marriage is this kind of person: He (or she) accepts the responsibilities and duties involved in marrying. He has the ability to make a living, or to operate a home. He has an appreciation of the rights of others, a record of problem handling and solving, especially in the field of human relations. He has no serious handicap of either personality or circumstance such as a tendency to gamble, drink or a backlog of debt. He has some knowledge of what makes a good marriage, some knowledge of techniques and of family planning. And finally, he knows what he wants and needs from his own marriage.

DR. FROMM: I think most people today have a picture in which life looks like a big department store in which you can get whatever you want—jobs, husbands, happiness—expecting them all to come from the outside, not from within themselves. And so, when these people think of a happy marriage they think they must find the person who will make them happy—and they fail to realize that nobody can make us happy unless we can produce something from within ourselves which makes us happy and the other person happy.

And so two people get married, each of whom has the illusion that somebody else will provide the happiness and then they naturally fail because their expectations are at cross purposes.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Dr. Adams, I'd like to go back to that figure you gave—only one out of five marriages is happy. Where does that come from?

DR. ADAMS: Well, we studied in detail the marriages of hundreds of college graduates about thirty years old, including a rating of the happiness of their marriages. Each husband and wife had to say that their marriage was "decidedly happy" or "extraordinarily happy" to fall into the category of happiness; and in addition to this, they had to show themselves free from fights and conflicts—so, on that basis, and being very generous, we decided only about 20 per cent of those studied could be called really happy.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Mrs. Ashenhurst, what do you think about all this? Yours is a modern marriage—what do you think young people today want and expect in marriage?

MRS. ASHENHURST: The ones I know of my own age are not taking very much for granted. They are very conscientious. They are reading a lot and thinking a lot and talking a lot, and when they make mistakes they are very much aware of fumbling.

I think this is because marriage today is more difficult than it was when the churches and the families and the group you belonged to had more control over it. Then, I think, the happiness of the people involved was not considered very important, and today I think it is. There are so many adjustments to be made today when you get married. You may have to leave your home town, find new friends, get more education ——

JUDGE POLIER: I agree that there are new problems in marriage today and that the emancipation of women is one of them.

DR. RAY: I quite agree with that.

MISS DUNNE: I will always defend the career woman.

JUDGE POLIER: Oh, I will defend her, too, but she does create some problems nevertheless. A woman who has a concept of her right to function as an individual, to work, is certainly not going to tolerate the kind of marriage a woman tolerated in another age when she was absolutely dependent on whomever she was married to for her daily bread, for bread for her children, and who, having once married, must, because of the absolute insistence of society, remain married and accept whatever came with that marriage.

TO A FOSTER CHILD

By DONNA DICKEY GUYER

Long, long ago when circles of slow time
Traced lazy patterns on the window shade
In childhood, I would watch their quiet climb,
And then it was that room enough was made
For you within my heart. The little dream
Had no illusion of some distant star,
No hazy moon reflected in a stream,
But you, dear child, as real as you are.
Within the loop of swifter years, a quest
Which led me blindly through time's barren span
Guided the longing deadlocked in my breast
Back to the circles where it first began.
And so the secret that you never knew
Is not your need of me, but mine of you.

Today we have a different concept of marriage—a concept of equal partnership, of happiness for two, and this puts additional strains on both men and women. Men cannot take as much for granted; a man has to invest more in his marriage to make it meaningful to both himself and his wife—and women, because of their new freedom, also have more responsibility in making marriage happy. There is a new inner content expected of marriage which creates a new challenge.

MRS. ASHENHURST: I guess I'm awfully reactionary, but I think there is too much talk about the fulfillment of women. Too often a woman feels that she's got to get this fulfillment, as Dr. Fromm says, from the outside, and that it's not something she can make within herself and within her home.

So many women seem to feel that only a business job will bring them up to the same status as their husbands and that this is good and this is going out and conquering the world, but lots of times these jobs aren't, I think, really what they are looking for. They don't get the status they think they are going to and they aren't even helped financially, for the amount of money made by women on most jobs is immediately dissipated by the need for a housekeeper, a cleaning woman, better clothes, transportation, outside lunch money, and that sort of thing.

My feeling has always been that I'd rather take in washing and stay home with my children in any real case of financial need because I feel I'm just better equipped to handle my children than anyone else is.

MISS DUNNE: Speaking of being reactionary, well, I mean if you would send me to the blackboard and ask me the answer to all our problems with children and write it 500 times I would just write: "Mother, Mother, Mother."

JUDGE POLIER: And I would add "Father, Father, Father," because I wouldn't like a matriarchal society. I think one of our problems today is that men are not sufficiently helped to become good fathers and play their role in the partnership of bringing up children.

There is nothing worse for a growing boy, for instance, than having the mother the person who makes all the decisions and the father coming in tired and weary and doing a little but not really participating in the bringing up of the child or participating fully in the family and community problems, so that the moral values and the teaching come too much from the mother and too little from the father.

DR. FROMM: I think this touches on a very important problem and that is what we call the equality of the sexes. I think there is a terrible confusion today about what equality is. What we mean by equality today is too often, I'm afraid, sameness.

This is actually a very destructive way to think about equality, and it has resulted, psychologically speaking, in the specific masculine role and the specific feminine role becoming all smudged and confused.

In general it could be said that it is up to the mother to give the child a sense of unconditional love, as if she said, "I love you whatever you do."

And it is up to the father to give the child a sense of duty, of ideas, of standards and, so to speak, to say, "I love you if you do right, if you do this and that."

Now I think both attitudes are necessary, even though they are contradictory. A person must learn to know from mother and then from within himself that he has a right to live and a right to be loved whatever he does, and at the same time he must learn to use his judgment also, and that he ought to do certain things and not do others.

But most people do not acquire both these attitudes together; as a result you find two personality types in our culture: those who expect to be loved unconditionally, no matter what they do; then the others who fear not being loved unless they constantly live up to expectations. Only the mature person lives with both attitudes, capably carrying this paradox of life.

DR. RAY: But when we take the men who commute and who get home late—they don't even see their children. Their children are in bed. How can they get to know them?

DR. FROMM: I think it isn't a matter of time primarily. You can have the most exhilarating experience in five minutes with your child, or anyone else, or you may spend two boring hours.

MRS. ASHENHURST: This is a problem about which a lot of people have spoken to me with tears in their eyes. So many of the men we know are just starting out and are working very hard, and some of them are studying too. They have terrifically high ideals of marriage and of raising children and yet the wives are frantic because the husbands see so little of the children and the husbands are worried and guilty because they are torn between their work and their real love for their families. And even when you agree that it is the quality and not the quantity of time that is going to be important, still it is a terrific pressure if you have very strong ideas on the importance of family life.

JUDGE POLIER: I think this raises the very real question of the impossibility of separating the ongoing creation of life, either in marriage or in the business world, from our relationship to other human beings. I doubt very much if anybody really can have a good marriage if the people in it are not capable of functioning both in the outside world and in their home, because marriage isn't something that can be packaged and presented to one but rather it is something that one has got to be constantly working at and creating and re-creating from day to day, just like any other relationship in life.

MISS DUNNE: Well, I happen to be a Catholic woman, born of Catholic parents, Catholic grandparents. I have no way of knowing how happy my grandfather and grandmother were; I suppose they were happy enough. I think my mother and father were happy. My own married life has been happy, I feel, because it has been based on faith and a very strong faith not only in the ideal of marriage as a sacred thing but also on faith in an organized religion and its rules and regulations.

Now to say that we have been the happiest family in the whole wide world and that is why we have stayed together—that is a matter of opinion, and I am not trying to hold my family up as an example. But I do feel that an answer for everyone can be found in a quotation from the present Pope's encyclical which says that we train for every profession in the world; why not train for marriage?

We have many young people who train right up to the hilt for their jobs but who expect to get married with very little thought of training. Now in our church we demand a certain amount of instruction and obedience to rules. And I think it is a good thing.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: You are speaking here, of course, of the for-a-lifetime view the Catholic Church takes of marriage. Dr. Fromm, what do you think about that? Can the commitment of two people to stay together for a lifetime stimulate love and happiness?

DR. FROMM: Yes, I think it can—if, that is, the people involved really want to learn how to love. I would say that in order to learn anything, the first condition must be that it is a matter of the utmost importance. You don't learn anything unless it is important to you—you just get a smattering of something.

But this is a very difficult question, because there are two extremes. The one extreme of thought is that any marriage is a matter of will. Now the objections to this idea arise because there is a certain subjective, individual element in the compatibility of two people. The other extreme—well, we have leaned over backward in modern thinking that this compatibility is a kind of euphoric, romantic feeling about which nothing can be done.

Now I think love in marriage is to a large extent a matter of decision and judgment, while most people think that love, any kind of love, is an agreeable excitement which either comes over you or it doesn't and you can't help it. It's there or it's not there and they are very disappointed because it hasn't lasted, because they are not accustomed to the idea that love is something which you can produce and which is to a large extent a matter of will and of judgment.

And so I would say that I would disagree with the extreme idea that marriage is entirely a matter of will—but I also disagree with our modern principle that it is entirely a matter of a romantic feeling that comes over you.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: And how do you think we can help? Would you suggest people learn to use will and judgment in marriage? How can we educate for the family-based marriage as opposed to the romantic marriage?

DR. FROMM: I would say, first, that we should concentrate on education for life, not just education for marriage.

Then I would say that first of all we must learn to be realistic. We think today we all are realists, but we are realists with regard to things only, not with regard to people. We live in the most frightful delusions about ourselves and about other people.

Take the matter of how we learn to live productively. How do most of us make use of the specifically human powers which we have—of our capacity to love, to have artistic experience? Do we not instead forget these and try to transform ourselves into a commodity, a thing, a machine to be bought and sold on the personality market and, if we sell, call that successful living?

We profess respect for humanity—but are we able to accept another person for what he is and not as we want to see him in our illusions?

We say we believe in charity and love, but are we able to have a sense of active responsibility for another person, a feeling in which we are indeed our brother's guardian and in which we feel as responsible for the other person as we do for ourselves?

And by this I do not mean "duty." Really the origin of the word responsibility comes from "respondere," to answer, to be responsive, to react to the other person as a human being, not in the sense of convenience or use, but out of a feeling of being one with him.

Now all this is closely connected to the concept of faith. Faith can be used in two senses. Faith in a certain doctrine, for instance. But I would also say faith is a character trait, a character trait of those people who can have a conviction without proof. This is using faith in a subtle and profound sense—for I am speaking now not just of the faith that is necessary to bring up a child knowing it will talk, it will walk, but rather of faith in life, in love, in the values of love.

Now if we do not value love, or charity, we cannot have faith in it. And so we have a very basic decision to make in our culture as to whether we are going to go on bringing up people whose ultimate value is wealth and consumption or whose ultimate values are in the great tradition of all the great religions, the great humanistic teachings of the last five thousand years.

I think we are in severe danger today that we lose these values. There are many symptoms of their loss, and the many failures in marriage is only one of them. And I am not comforted by the fact that superficially, many people profess to all sorts of faiths and ideologies, for they do not appear to be real to them.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: Let us leave temporarily this question of values now and ask Dr. Pearson how he as a doctor feels he can help people have happy relationships.

DR. PEARSON: Well, physicians deal mostly with the physical side of marriage and it is a very important one, not only from the sexual point of view but from the well-being of a family as a whole.

And I think it is very important for young people who are engaged to seek medical examinations and advice at least six weeks before their wedding so that any bodily disorders which might be detrimental can be discovered and then possibly corrected.

Also I believe that a doctor serves a definite purpose in checking the sexual organs. In almost any physician's experience you will find marriages in which the couples have been living together for years without ever having had sexual intercourse because something physically was wrong. Now I am not talking about ignorance of the actual technique of sexual intercourse. Today almost everybody knows the mechanics involved in sex. But as well as correcting physical handicaps to a rapid and happy sexual adjustment, the doctor can also help resolve faulty attitudes toward sex. There may be guilt, inhibition, a difference in desire and attitude, and unless the two people involved have thought these over or, better yet, talked them over with helpful guidance, argument and dissension will arise between them.

I also believe it's important for the couple to get help on contraception, either on mechanical types or, if they are of a faith which interdicts these, on biological methods. Frequently, too, an assurance that the young woman possesses normal organs will resolve the secret fear of undertaking future pregnancies.

And it should be added that getting this help before marriage is important economically. After a young couple marries, they usually feel they should assume their own doctor's bills, but before marriage their parents are usually quite willing to help them get medical care and advice if they want it.

DR. FROMM: It is good not to overemphasize sexual technique, for a good-functioning sexuality is a result of love, of tact, of responsibility in the sense of responding as I suggested—not of mechanics. There is no right technique which can guarantee love.

DR. PEARSON: Yes, I think we all ought to be sure we do keep the sexual aspect of marriage in perspective. I object, personally, for instance, very strongly to the burden of proof that our culture, our romantic novels put upon the male as a great lover. The man today is supposed to be a combination Clark Gable and Gregory Peck and send his wife into ecstasy every time he looks at her. So many young women expect so much that they are always coming around to doctors saying, "My husband didn't do this" or "My husband didn't do that" when it shouldn't be the poor fellow's entire responsibility.

DR. FROMM: I wouldn't say people expect too much. It could be said with equally good reason that they expect too little. It is that they expect the wrong things. A fantasy instead of a reality, I think.

MRS. ASHENHURST: Maybe it's the wrong person they expect too much of. All the songs talk about finding the ideal person, the perfect girl, the only boy—and if you listen to a group of office girls or high-school girls talking, they are all talking about their dream man.

But you seldom hear anybody say, "I want to grow up and be this ideal person myself, this kind of person with this kind of life, and I want to be this way not only in my twenties but in my forties and sixties." It's always the other person who is expected to be wonderful and dreamy, whether it's sexually or socially or intellectually or anything else.

And yet it seems to me that if the person were more concerned about what he or she was developing into himself, it would automatically be easier to find an ideal husband and a happy marriage.

MISS DUNNE: Well, that goes back to learning unselfishness at a very early age and not just when you get engaged.

DR. FROMM: That word unselfishness—it is often used in very different meanings. It's not accidental that the Bible says "love thy neighbor as thyself," for if you are a loving person at all, you love human beings, and since you are a human being you love yourself too.

The selfish person usually is a person who is not capable of loving others or loving himself, and out of this lack of love for himself he becomes anxiously concerned with not getting what he wants. You will find the same thing in mothers who lack faith in themselves and in their children and therefore try to compensate for this lack of faith by an overanxious, greedy possessiveness.

Real unselfishness exists in the sense that the pleasure in giving is greater than the pleasure of receiving.

CHAIRMAN HICKEY: And so we are back again at the question, can love and unselfishness be taught? Dr. Adams, as a marriage counselor, what do you think?

DR. ADAMS: Well, I don't feel that a marriage course or any other course can teach people how to love or how to be loved. Everybody feels that he wants love, but no one is going to get it very long if he in return cannot give it.

But I do think in marriage courses you can unlearn some of the things that stand in the way of learning to love. You can unlearn some of your fantasy pictures of what to expect in marriage, for instance—but the real preparation for marriage, I think, ought to begin first in the cradle, and then in the first grade in school. We should learn how to make friends and live with friends first, then later, say in high school, how to get a job and earn a living and finally how to find a good marriage partner and to work out a marriage. The basic responsibility is to teach how to live a life.

DR. FROMM: I agree that the schools should have courses in the art of living which should be given each year on the level of understanding of the child.

But in suggesting such courses I think one thing should be kept in mind: psychology today is as much of a danger as it is a help. People are beginning to think that one can learn the art of living cerebrally, with the brain alone—just as one can learn in the do-it-yourself business how to build a canoe.

People who talk and talk and talk very often do not realize that there are certain acts to which one must commit oneself if one is really going to learn anything. The person who wants to swim, for instance, can talk with the swimming teacher all he wants to, but he can never learn to swim until he commits himself to trust the carrying power of the water.

I would say if I could be quite concrete that the one of the things I would try to teach a young person in preparation for marriage is the ability to be alone, to be with himself or herself, without a book, a radio, or something to do. Just sitting still. People who cannot endure to be alone with themselves cling to somebody else anxiously hoping to be relieved of the awful burden of living.

And so to educate people not to be greedy with regard to what another person can give, I would make the preparation for marriage a preparation of character, so that each person can learn to stand on his own feet, be productive, have faith in and depend on himself and not need a marriage partner as a lifesaver.

DR. ADAMS: Nobody can sit alone by himself without some information that has not come to him through his brain. You cannot make your mind a complete vacuum.

MISS DUNNE: I think anybody who sits by himself and does nothing is just wasting time that could be used in prayer. Prayer accomplishes more than this world ever dreams of.

DR. RAY: And meditation ——

DR. FROMM: Ideally, the capacity to learn to love and to have faith should be developed young, but it can occur even in old people, depending upon how alive a person remains, and how open they are to a new development within themselves.

DR. PEARSON: Can we be more precise? Dr. Fromm, how do you think we are really going to get more mature people in our society?

DR. FROMM: Well, it is a large order, but this is the function of creating a social and economic system more conducive to man's unfolding. It is the function of all great spiritual teaching, of all great philosophies—to create an atmosphere which is conducive to the continuous birth and growth of man within himself.

JUDGE POLIER: I would agree with that wholeheartedly. And it is indeed a large order, but it is not one which we should be defeated by. Discussing and considering what we can do to prepare young people for a better way of living, a more ethical way of living, a fuller way of living, is terribly important and we must not be too discouraged because it is more exciting to many people to punish people or build better prisons than it is to prevent badness in the first place. We have only recently become concerned about children in trouble.

Our next step is going to be—it must be—really meaningful, deep pervasive thinking and concern with the preparation of every child for life, and as a very important part of life, marriage.

MR. GOULD: This is the ideal which everyone is trying to attain. There is going to be plenty of activity on other levels without anybody's encouragement. I am glad we have made this effort to find out what is the ideal of marriage, the practical ideal, the attainable ideal, that we're concerned with. END

The most important thought I ever had was that of my individual responsibility to God.

WHY DO SO MANY HOLLYWOOD MARRIAGES FAIL?

husband didn't really like women. My second husband was a drummer in a band. You know how musicians are—they get all steamed up and they like to play all night, and come home at six in the morning. It was awful after we had the baby. I had to train her to have breakfast at two in the afternoon, lunch at seven P.M. and dinner at midnight. I stood it for four years and then I quit.

"Now I'm just married again, and I'm beginning to wonder whether it wouldn't be good to stay home and take care of the baby. I guess that's just the way it is—your first and second marriages you don't take too seriously, but when you get to your third one you sort of begin to think."

Her new husband, who also makes a living as a stand-in, chimed in: "In marriage at least one person has to give and to make sacrifices, and that person is usually the woman. The big movie stars I've seen don't know how to give—they are just used to getting. They get fame and adulation and the things money buys, so what do they know about giving?

"In an ordinary marriage the man gives the woman material security, as well as love, and the woman gives him the feeling of home and comfort. But what happens to this balance if she's out working all day, maybe making more money than he is?"

The dress designer, black-haired and elegant, gazed dreamily from the window across the movie lot where she has been working for the last twenty years. "I remember a lovely young actress for whom I designed a wedding dress," she said. "She was all starry-eyed and in love with the architect she was going to marry. 'If it ever comes to a choice between my career and my marriage, the career will have to go,' she told me.

"So they were married, and after a while I began to hear complaints: 'He brings his business home at night, and I'm so tired from the studio I can't understand what he's talking about.' Or: 'The studio wants me to go on location next week, and he's invited some clients to dinner and wants me to be hostess.' Or: 'He can't seem to understand why I have to wear such an expensive dress to a preview, or why I can't ever wear it in public any more.'

"By that time she was getting a hundred thousand dollars a picture, and that kind of money is hard to give up. It was easier to give up the marriage, and she did.

"Ninety per cent of the divorces are the fault of the women. Women are more frantic than men. I can see it when we're fitting clothes here. There's a note of hysteria in their voices and in the way they tug at the clothes, which men just don't have. After all, a man can always dig ditches, but what can an old actress do? Unless she's very great, mother roles are the end. And acting is like drugs—they can't give it up.

"I don't think most of these girls really understand men. They haven't had time to think about things like men and women and love and marriage—most of them have worked so hard all their lives. They suddenly fall in love with some actor—not the man he is, but the role he plays—and they marry him without knowing the real man. Then they find out that he isn't Prince Charming or Rhett Butler or whatever, and that's the end—divorce."

The press agent flicked a cigarette ash off his tweed coat, and said he had it all figured out. "It's easy—they marry the wrong people," he declared. "They're kids, and they're playing in the same picture, maybe as extras. And one night just for a lark they think it would be cute to get married. And they do, without knowing a real thing about each other. Then one day they wake up and bingo! Divorce.

"Hollywood is full of off-beat characters; they wouldn't be here if they weren't off-beat, the girls too. The little extra girls, the starlets too, I've heard them sit around on the sets between takes, discussing the actors they're having affairs with. 'Who are you sleeping with now?' is a perfectly ordinary opening remark for a conversation. Sex is as cheap and easy as a ham sandwich.

"The marriages which seem to last are ones where the wife is pretty tolerant. After all, there's a lot of temptation around here, and a man is only human. Sooner or later the wife comes to hear of it and then she can do one of two things: divorce him, or say to herself, 'O.K., so he's unfaithful, but I'm still Mrs. Star, with my home and children.' The wise women do that, and sooner or later their husbands come home.

"The ones who have it toughest are the big women stars who get divorced. They're all lonely. Who would marry them except a heel?"

Studio publicity woman: "If a woman feels a little beholden to a man, and if she looks up to him, it's better for a marriage. But it's hard for a movie queen to look up to any man she marries, and how can she feel beholden?

"Half the time she's so busy making pictures off on location that she can't run her home properly. And man is a creature of routine: he likes to find his wife by the fireside, his slippers under the chair, and his toothbrush in exactly the same place every night."

The Hollywood columnist was in bed with a cold, crackling hoarsely over the telephone. "I never know the real truth, and none of us do," he croaked. "They'll tell us what they want us to know, and nothing else. So will the press agents. By the time they get into a divorce court they've got an agreement all worked out with their lawyers, and they've decided what they're going to say. It may or may not have anything to do with the truth. The main concern is how the community property is going to be settled, and they'll tell any kind of story to get that settled right.

"But as far as I know, they divorce for the same reason other people do—they can't get along. Where the man of the family is a man, then they can usually get along all right. But where the man of the family is a woman, then there's trouble.

"Then there's sex—probably more cheating goes on here than anywhere else. Most of these people have few inner resources, and between pictures they get bored. Temptation is easy, and what else is there to do?

"The woman stars have been built up as symbols of sex, and as they get older it occasionally seems necessary to them to prove that they really are what they've been built up as on the screen. But they tend to be masculine in their quest for satisfaction—they think 'I want pleasure' without thinking much of giving pleasure. Therefore they are not considered satisfactory bedmates, in or out of marriage.

"I've been making an informal survey on the divorces of entertainers and the homes they came from. Have you ever realized how many divorced actors and actresses come from homes in which their own parents were divorced? My survey indicates that a larger percentage of them come from broken homes than is the norm—about eighty per cent. Take Lana Turner, Marilyn Monroe, Clark Gable, Judy Garland—they've all had broken homes in their childhood, and some sad marriages in their maturity."

"Divorce is chic in Hollywood," said the manager of a hotel where many of the stars have stayed. "A perfectly nice girl who in ordinary circumstances would try to make her marriage work, in Hollywood goes ahead and gets a divorce because everyone else seems to be doing it. This attitude seems to affect even some of the Catholic marriages.

"In ordinary life a group of young married people are friends, and a wife or a husband doesn't like to break up the social circle. But movie people don't have that stable circle—they often go out with people not because they are friends, but because their company is good for publicity. So if they want to split up, they're splitting nothing but themselves."

The screen writer's sports shirt was gay, but his face was gloomy as he thought of marriage and divorce in Hollywood—a subject he has studied on and off for thirty years.

"My seventeen-year-old daughter is intrigued by the movies," he explained, "and thinks she might want to be an actress. I tell her that I can't think of a single successful woman in the business who is happy, and that's true. The surest guarantee for an unhappy life is to become a movie star.

"Show business is showing off, by definition. An actor or actress is the kind of person who wants to show off, who wants the limelight. And this kind of person can rarely create a happy marriage; they have such violent egos they'd probably be unhappy anywhere. Everything that makes for a good actor or actress makes for a bad husband or wife.

"Adulation makes for self-centeredness, and self-centeredness breaks up marriages. Women seem to be more corrupted by it than men, or perhaps a woman can stand a self-centered husband better than a man can stand a self-centered wife.

"This is the hardest place in the world to bring up children. When a child sees wild parties and his parents drunk, and reads in a scandal magazine how mother spent a night in a motel with a man who isn't daddy, how do you think that child is going to turn out? And if a marriage is already having difficulties, the difficulties over the badly influenced child only make matters worse.

"This business is poison for children, including the ones who actually get into it. Look at the former child stars like Jackie Coogan, Mickey Rooney, Judy Garland, Jane Withers, Elizabeth Taylor and Shirley Temple—every one of them has had trouble with marriage."

Hollywood is full of lawyers, and one of them has handled enough big movie divorces in the last twenty-five years to have concluded that "by and large, most actors are a bunch of barnyard roosters.

"Most of them have been poor and uneducated all their lives," he said. "Suddenly they find themselves swamped with money. They substitute vulgar lavishness for taste because they have no taste.

"They know nothing about marriage. The girl knows nothing about children or running a home. And the boy? Probably a year or two ago he was picking grapes or driving a truck. Understanding, kindness, give and take—these, too, they know nothing about. Directly they quarrel, they run to a lawyer. They can afford it, and locally it's a prestige thing to do."

New Mum® cream works a completely different way. It is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor. Mum keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day—no matter how active your perspiration glands are.

No wonder Mum is so dependable. Isn't that what you want?

most of today's big stars, perched on a high stool and thought about them.

"You can almost tell by the way a star acts at a sitting what kind of wife she is," he meditated. "Some of them are so conceited they sit and preen like peacocks, arching and stretching and patting themselves, even when I'm finished with the pictures. And some of them are so stupid they can't understand the simplest direction. Who wants a conceited wife, or a stupid one, even if she's beautiful?

"But really, I feel sorry for most of them—they have so many pressures on them. They always have to be thinking about their hair or their figures or their clothes—every day is filled with appointments. Take a big star like Loretta Young. Last year she wanted to pose for a picture for a big magazine, but in the ten days before the magazine deadline she simply couldn't find one single hour free. She was all tied up for weeks and weeks.

"Then there's the atmosphere of constant fear which surrounds an actress—fear that someone else will do a better Saint Joan, or that she'll gain weight, or get wrinkles, or a younger actress will be given a higher billing. These are life-and-death matters to a professional actress. These stars work hard and they're afraid, afraid all the time. Can you imagine what that kind of fear and tension and weariness do to a marriage?

"I feel sorry, too, for the unmarried or divorced star, sitting all alone up in her mansion in Beverly Hills. A star already has everything, including eight cars, so why should a man bother to send her flowers or perfume, or pick her up for a date? If a man wants to see her, he calls her up and tells her to run on over in one of her cars and maybe they might go on somewhere. So the courtships start out wrong and after that the marriage goes wrong too."

The chief support of an autocracy is a standing army. The chief support of a democracy is an educated people.

LOTUS D. CAUFFMAN

And so they talked and explained and sometimes disagreed, the people of Hollywood, the people who have observed for years the marriages of the glittering personalities at the center of their working world. Too much sex? Too little sex? Too much liquor? Overdemanding egos? Pressure of work? Boredom? Fear and insecurity? Selfishness? On all these elements there was a difference of emphasis.

Much of the time they have watched some or all of these elements splinter marriages into heartbreak. It is only by triumphing over these pressures, they point out, that some Hollywood marriages have survived. And survival takes work, and agreement.

Robert Stack, for instance, who did not marry until he was thirty-six, because he had observed so many "messy" marriages, told interviewers at the time of his marriage that he and his new wife had agreed never to go away alone on locations, to have real friends and not ones chosen for publicity reasons, and to have privacy in their home lives. Jean Simmons and her husband, Stewart Granger, have made a similar decision, and so far both couples seem to have survived the Hollywood undercurrents.

There are many others. No outsider can presume to say whether a marriage is happy or unhappy, but the list of those whose marriages have endured without open friction and with strong suggestion of happiness is impressive. The group of older, stable couples, held up as models to younger couples, includes Claudette Colbert and Dr. Joel Pressman, Loretta Young and Tom Lewis, Jack Benny and Mary Livingston, Irene Dunne and Dr. Francis Griffin, George Burns and Gracie Allen and the director William Goetz and his wife.

Joel McCrea and Frances Dee are universally admired and envied—they are one of the few long-married couples about whom there never any gossip. Others on whom Hollywood will place long-term bets (even if previous marriages have ended in divorce) are Alan Ladd and Sue Carol, Rosalind Russell and Freddie Brisson, Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall, James Cagney, Pat O'Brien, Ray Milland, Cary Grant, James Stewart, Jerry Lewis, Burt Lancaster, Ronald Colman (of course) and, surprisingly but rather touchingly, Judy Garland in her reconciled marriage with Sid Luft. There are many others.

But these are the ones who have won through against tremendous odds, against the insidious Hollywood pressure of what must inevitably be called false values. And in almost every case, it is interesting to note, the man in the marriage has been the dominating figure professionally. If the woman dominates, makes more money, receives more adulation, the chances for a happy marriage in Hollywood, it appears, are near invisibility.

MOTHERS ENFORCE CLEANUP OF COMICS

little brother and sister to read anything but animal comics, and it's a good thing. When they're out playing games I hear them say, 'No, don't do it that way, this is the way they do it in the comics.'"

Two and a half years have passed since the crusade began. What have been the actual results? The worst of the crime and horror comics no longer are sold. Though there is no organized system for checking stands now, individual club members are taking the responsibility of constant vigilance. But there are intangible results too. Many parents say their work in the drive has alerted them to the contents of the comics and the reading habits of their children. Therefore they have been able to mold the tastes of the youngsters so that many no longer care for comics.

Mrs. Kate Woolsey, the slender, white-haired woman in charge of the North Platte Junior Library, though she took no active part in the initiation of the crusade, has been one of the chief allies from the beginning. And she has been a real influence in encouraging children to patronize the library. When parents ask her, "How do I help my child to read better?" Mrs. Woolsey, as often as not, says, "Sounds as if he has been reading too many comics. Send him over to the library and let us find out what he's interested in."

In the cheerful Junior room, bright with salmon-colored bookcases, every bit of reading material is graded by age. There are boys' books on jet motors and rockets, all well illustrated, and easy biographies. Children, intrigued by the beautiful pictures, will point to the title and ask, "What's that say?" and a new word is learned. "Don't fuss with poor readers," Mrs. Woolsey reminds both teachers and parents at P.T.A. meetings, "send them down here." A year or more ago, children used to bring their comic books to the library to read, but Mrs. Woolsey hasn't seen any around lately.

Although the industry has set standards for comics, most mothers feel it is only a beginning. Under the Comics Code Authority, Mrs. Guy Percy Trulock, a former president of the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, as administrator, there is no longer advertising of "art" and pictures, of books on sex instruction, of knives, fireworks and guns. Nakedness has been covered up, and brutal torture, unnecessary knife or gun play, physical agony, gory and gruesome crimes, seduction, rape and perversion are also taboo. But violence remains. "Now they kill only one person every ten pages instead of one every page," Jo Blackledge has noted. Jo won't allow such comics in her home, and whenever her boys bring her to read aloud from a comic story, she finds herself automatically correcting the grammar.

But the efforts of the North Platte club, together with all the other 15,550 clubs, represent an important citizen victory—though the war itself is by no means over.

Mary E. Vroman

"I was born in Buffalo," writes MARY ELIZABETH VROMAN, author, with Nelle Keys Perry, of Demonstrated Ability (page 149), "but spent my childhood on the island of Antigua with my wonderful aunt, who was a gold mine of patience and information. She founded the T.O.R. Memorial High School there and gave me an education for which I am eternally grateful." Miss Vroman—now Mrs. Daniel P. Gibson—graduated from college in Alabama with a B.Sc. in elementary education. While teaching, she won the Christopher Award for her story See How They Run (published in the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL in 1951). Two years later, in New York, she met her husband—an advertising representative for Johnson Publications—and at present she teaches the sixth grade in P. S. 194. "I love books, people, Chopin and pie," she says, "but I love teaching most of all."

Nelle Keys Perry

Before coming to the JOURNAL five years ago, NELLE KEYS PERRY, Assistant to the Editor, was stationed in San Francisco as a Navy public-information officer. She is still a lieutenant in the Naval Reserve, and the walls of her office are decorated with Navy mementos, such as a picture of her favorite ship, the USS N. K. Perry (DDR 883). Of her work on Demonstrated Ability, she says, "It was wonderful to be back in a service atmosphere again, even if there weren't any ships around. I love the Navy, but I'd rather be doing my present work than anything else—only I'd like to be doing it in San Francisco."

Ethel Gordon

Although ETHEL EDISON GORDON (see The Deception on page 62) majored in English at New York University and always intended to write, she didn't begin in earnest until World War II. "I was following my husband, Heyman, then," she says, "and was very much alone in some of the smallest, hottest, remotest towns in Louisiana. I had to do something." One of her stories appeared in the O. Henry Prize Collection of 1945; another in the Foley Best American Short Stories of 1951. The Gordon family, which now includes David, aged four, lives in Long Beach, New York, where Heyman teaches history. "We have a small Williamsburg Colonial house," reports Mrs. Gordon, "full of Staffordshire dogs, lusterware, hooked rugs and as many early-American antiques as we can afford. The Army, though, left us with a taste for travel and we've had a fair share of that in Europe and in Mexico." For instance, last summer—taking David along—they drove six thousand miles in the British Isles.

Walkout on Teaching

Somewhere in the United States

Dear Editors: Around colleges today, students seldom talk enthusiastically about teaching. The engineers swagger along with their slide rules; the "ags" roll by in jeans and plaid shirts; the art students importantly prop their boards at vantage points around the campus; the law boys cradle their pipes in their hands. But no one admits to being an "education" major unless he is pinned to the wall.

The hangdog attitude of the education majors exists partly because "no one who could do anything else would go into a field with so little money in it." But it exists mostly because the students themselves know that education courses are not intellectually up to snuff, that fellow students look down on anyone who will voluntarily take courses so openly proclaimed stupid and boring. The terrifying result is not simply that few teachers are being turned out by the colleges. It is that students right and left come to college with the idea of being teachers, and after a few courses in education flee to fields which have more stimulating, more challenging courses. With no hue and cry, but by a simple walkout, they refuse to stomach "education." If they have to take these courses to become teachers—all right, they won't be teachers. There are lots of other interesting things to do. (And it is the bright student for whom there are many interesting possibilities in life.)

For a long time I have been aware of a flight from teaching. So has the National Education Association. So has everyone concerned with the future of our children. But my concern reached a fissionable state this year when, as an adviser, I noted one bright student after another drop his education major and pick up another career. Certainly money was not the whole answer, for many of the students were girls, who seldom aspire to the big money in business and industry. More important, the students still wanted to teach, but just couldn't "take any more of that kind of Mickey Mouse."

Much perturbed, I talked to teachers in other fields, only to find out that they had long taken this trend for granted. "Oh, yes," said a psychology professor matter-of-factly, "we get a lot of education students. Even more go in for sociology. Since our fields have many of the appeals of teaching, students get some of the things they want without having to take education courses." He could afford to be offhand; the students were going into his field.

I started questioning the youngster who wanted to shift out of the education division into the one in which I teach. "You've already had two years in education," I might point out, "and will lose some credit hours toward your degree. That loss will mean another semester or an extra summer in school. You're sure you want to change?"

Built-up frustrations poured out.

"If I had to sit through one more course that tells me the school has an effect on the child, I'd hang myself. I figured that out in the tenth grade!"

"I've always wanted to teach, so I've stuck it out, but there's simply nothing there except yackety-yak. It's like someone talking and talking, sure that if he uses enough words, he can teach you to swim on dry land."

A mathematics student was even more furious. "You really wouldn't believe what we're doing. I came to college to learn something, and here I am taking courses in third-grade arithmetic—the third-grade courses themselves! And me with four years of math in high school. The other night I spent three hours painting numbers on clothespins so we could have fun in arithmetic!"

Actually, this last student is better off than many others. At least she knows some mathematics. In many states, the boards of education require the student to take many "education" courses but no one course in mathematics, the subject to be taught. In my own school, students have reported an education class in which a professor declared flatly that if students took plenty of education courses they could teach anything. Echoes of this preposterous claim come from all over the country.

The present system of "education" is based on two theories: that teachers should have some training in methods of teaching, and that one should know a good deal about the child himself. Nothing could sound more reasonable. And nothing is. Students value the chance to do practice teaching under an experienced teacher. An internship wherein a student has complete charge of a course for six weeks—planning assignments, grading papers, managing recitations, often helping with school sports, plays, assemblies—can be extremely valuable. It is the one course of which students say, "I think we should have more."

But the educationist has now shifted the personality emphasis from knowing the child to adjusting the child. He has forgotten that psychology and method were but a means to an end (that of teaching the subject) and has made them ends in themselves. No wonder students are walking out on education courses! When a subject like vocational agriculture has sixteen courses on how to teach it, "Education" has got out of hand.

Every good teacher tries to awaken a child's interest. But to assume that a child must choose what he shall learn, or that all learning is fun, is a distortion of reality. John Dewey himself, who started this trend, warned that "the basic material of study cannot be picked up in cursory matter." You don't learn medicine by watching Spencer Tracy be a doctor, or zoology by going to the zoo.

What education people have failed to recognize is that college students know these things to be true. The student has received a severe jolt in moving from his "child-centered" high school to the demands of college; and he finds himself passing judgment on the irresponsible immaturity which much high-school training favors. Then he encounters the flatulence of some education course which denies all that he has suddenly recognized is true. This is not what he came to college for. So he drops it.

It is easy to say, "Those students who dropped probably don't have a strong enough drive toward teaching anyway." What do people want, a walking-barefoot-over-hot-coals test? The public has too long battened on the devotion of the dedicated teacher who pours out a 60-hour week. Now schools of education want to rob students of one of the principal reasons for teaching—the excitement of working with ideas. And the teaching profession has enough strikes against it without putting up such barriers to eager minds. Bigger and better schools (any time the public will pay for them) are a simple matter. More and better teachers are neither easily bought nor easily made. We can run out of teachers.

I believe in students and their infinite possibilities. I believe in knowledge and its real power. I believe teaching is one of the most exciting things one can do. But the education student never sees it that way. He is drowned in cant, methodology and theory—much of it wrong. I feel sorry for them all, and I'm thoroughly worried. I wish someone else were too.

Dear Editors: We were delighted with Be Happy Here (How Young America Lives, December JOURNAL), but were astonished when we read that the Bascom family's indebtedness "is down to $2500." Actually, it is nearer $25,000—and even those "nice, quiet cows" are mortgaged. Horace is still doing the work of three men, and we'd like folks to know the truth.

Very truly yours,

Dear Sirs: I doubt this letter will be published, since the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL loves to exploit the "feminine superiority" angle. But I couldn't resist answering Ashley Montagu, who says that women are more "kind, considerate, sympathetic." (December JOURNAL.) If this is so, may I ask why more murders are committed by women—and why they kill their victims in slow, tortuous ways, whereas a man usually kills his quickly. Rudyard Kipling had the right idea when he said, "the female of the species is more deadly than the male."

Sincerely yours,

Voteless Americans

Lowman, New York

Dear Journal Editors: Until two months ago, our family was under the impression that any citizen of the United States with the desire to vote could do so. How wrong we were! We tried to register here, only to find we lacked sufficient time at this address. We inquired about voting at our old address. No, we had been gone too long from there.

One son who has been in South Carolina since January was unable to vote because he hadn't lived in the state a year; our other son got his discharge from the Navy in February, and he, too, was unable to vote.

We feel something is very wrong. Are our registration laws outmoded? How can we, as individuals, do something about it?

Sincerely,
MRS. L. C. HENDERSON

POEM

Brookline, Massachusetts

Dear Editor: My wife—for no good reason—has been on that diet of yours, see, and just kidding around I made up this little jingle which she thought was funny, and the other night we saw these friends of ours and the better half of that team was on the diet too. So my wife said read them your POEM (she put the word "poem" in capital letters, if you know what I mean) and they thought it was funny, too, and Marshall—that's the other fellow's name—said "I'll bet the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL would publish that." So here is the POEM.

I'd like to consign to the regions infernal
The diet-crazed staff of the Ladies' Home Journal
My grunt-groaning spouse is becoming the vehicle
To show what we mean by onomatopoeical.
The contentment of cows that are owned by Carnation
Is not the result of their deep concentration
On calorie charts or a sad contemplation
Of direful effects on their carbo-hydration.
OH NO!
I cry, as a husband who really enjoys
The beautiful view of her avoirdupois—
OH NO!

Very truly yours,
K.R.T.

P.S. If this should be published, please don't give my name, because I have to work.

Some Husbands Need Training . . .

Natick, Massachusetts

Many men have not been trained in the art of giving. Often they are busy and under pressure at work. But this typical male malady can be overcome!

1—Educate your children in the art of giving gifts.

2—Remember your husband on his birthday and Valentine's Day.

3—Select gifts with a thought for his hobbies and interests.

Perhaps these positive steps may help your "Interested Reader" who craved thoughtfulness from her husband.

Another Husband

. . . But So Do Some Wives

Honolulu, T.H.

"Interested Reader" brought up an interesting question. My husband has never brought me so much as a posy picked off a bush outside, either before or after marriage. It would never occur to him. But as a very dear Japanese friend once said to me (after I apologized for my husband's sloppiness), "Oh, he a man!"

I have never heard a more wise statement—and because I sat up and took notice my marriage has turned out to be much more wonderful than I dreamed possible. My husband is of no use around the house, nor is he a handy man. However, he supports me, loves me and my companionship. Not only that, but his friends are pleased because I make him happy.

One "Honey, that was a wonderful dinner" is worth a dozen flower shops full of posies. After all, "He a man!"

THE WHITE SOFA

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

The children were furnishing their first real home, now that the baby had come and the little apartment they had taken near us, as a makeshift until they could find something more satisfactory, had become too small.

The children are my son and daughter-in-law. They don't mind being called "the children" when there is no implication of their being minors and incompetent.

We had all looked for an apartment in overcrowded New York, which is rapidly becoming a city of homes for rich or poor only. On the unfashionable side of the city, they had finally found an almost ideal apartment for their needs and income.

Some days later my son called up and reported, "Well, we've found a sofa! It was standing in a window, and we went right in and bought it."

"What's it like?" I asked.

"Oh, it's long, wide and low. The covering is a nubbly white material. It will look swell."

"White?" I cried. "Have you gone crazy? White—in New York! You know what it means to keep house in New York—the soot—and white—and with a child in the house? Do you know what it will look like in no time—unless you are going to pay to have it cleaned every month? You say it's big, very wide. Well, it will jut too far into the room and look more like a white elephant than a sofa. I advise you to cancel the order—send it back—and what did you pay?"

He told me and I replied, "And it's too expensive also. Why in heaven's name didn't you shop around a bit?"

He answered that the sofa had been delivered, was already in its place in the apartment, and besides, it was exactly what they wanted. "Good-by," he said coldly, and hung up.

When I turned from the telephone, my husband (my son's stepfather) was flushed with anger. "You heard that?" I asked. "A white sofa! They haven't the sense that they were born with."

"And you," said my normally loving husband, "haven't learned any sense about some things. You are the one who's crazy. Why don't you leave the children alone? It's their home, not yours, it's their money, and for that matter they have a perfect right to make their own mistakes. Because of a darned sofa you are spoiling your relations with the children that normally could hardly be better. At this moment they're wishing you were in Timbuktu, unless there's someplace farther away."

I sat down, not quietly, but as though I had been pushed, and started to cry a bit. "So now you are crying over that sofa," my husband said with growing exasperation.

"No, I'm not," I sputtered. "I'm crying because I've been such a fool."

"Stop it," he said rudely. "But God forbid that you should ever have to live with the children!"

I sat there and brooded. My husband was absolutely right. I realized that from the moment the children had taken the apartment, I had been giving them unsolicited advice, and encountered, in my son in particular, a very stubborn resistance. It had started when he had announced—in comment on my suggestion that they look at some of the better auction galleries for nice pieces that could often be picked up inexpensively—"We don't want old furniture. We want the apartment contemporary—modern."

I realized that I had been steadily attempting to impose upon the children my own tastes. I don't like dark walls. I don't like green. I like traditional furniture—authentic eighteenth-century English and French if I can afford it, or good reproductions. I don't find most modern furniture comfortable. I detest "posture" chairs. I dislike side draperies. Curtains must draw. I don't like Venetian blinds, which, when open, suggest to me prison bars. And, as one who has kept house for thirty years, I am conscious of such matters as durability and upkeep.

My son, I thought, had always loved his home with me. How often he had said, "Ma, I hope you never change a thing in this room. I like it exactly as it is. I wouldn't feel at home if you changed it."

He liked his mother's home. He liked the environment his stepfather and I have created for ourselves. He likes to think it's there. But it is not his environment. The children want to create their own. They don't want to live in an annex of yours, I said to myself, wondering how I could have been so incredibly stupid. So unbearably bossy.

I called up and apologized, saying I had been tired and cross. Eventually, when everything was in place, we were invited to dinner, my daughter-in-law watching me, I unhappily thought, rather anxiously. But the apartment was charming. The white sofa, against a dark blue-green wall, was handsome. The furniture in all the rooms was well distributed, and in size and color harmonious. The apartment was expressive of the children. It was not remotely expressive of me—as I am now, or as I was when I was their age. But it was becoming to them. I love to go there, enjoying the change from my own environment. And I don't have to live there.

I don't have to live there. That thought, echoing my husband's, brought others in its train.

Suppose I did. Suppose things should so work out that they would feel they must share a home with me. We love each other; our tastes in many things are highly compatible. But what would happen?

I have been mistress of my own home for many years. I am accustomed to a certain order and routine, partly established by my work. I am not an early riser, but a punctual one. I never CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

MANAO TUPAPAO (The Spirit Watches), woodcut by Paul Gauguin (French School, 1848–1903). Size, 8⅞″ x 18″. Executed around 1900, during the artist's last sojourn in Tahiti, it is perhaps Gauguin's most important single woodcut. It is exceedingly rare, since he printed not more than six impressions.

lunch beyond a snack when I feel like it. I always dine at precisely the same time. I never receive visitors until after five o'clock in the afternoon. I am fixed in my ways.

They are good ways for me, and they happen, also, to conform to those of my husband. But he is my age. They are not the ways of my more helter-skelter children, always ready to change a date, change their minds, call up half a dozen people to come in for lunch or after dinner that very night, and, outside necessary restrictions, live happily from day to day.

Some of my friends are their friends in whose homes we sometimes both find ourselves guests, and they seldom refuse an invitation to dinner at our house, even if there are no other young people. Youth has been emancipated from many old restrictions between generations. But in general their friends and interests are different from mine.

If we lived together, they or I would continually be making sacrifices and adjustments. We would start doing that, I am sure, with the utmost good will. But, in the end, one or the other would have to capitulate.

Nobody relinquishes his life easily. If I were to dominate, the family relationships of the children—to their children, and to their friends—would be immeasurably damaged. If I should capitulate, my life would end before its end.

If this were only a personal anecdote, it would not be worth recounting. But it is not. How many women have written me on just this subject! Of the parent or "in-law" who has come to make a home with them and of the misery that has ensued. It is not that love Let no one who loves be called altogether unhappy. Even love unreturned has its rainbow.

is initially lacking. It is that love dies under the strain.

It was not always so—or not always to the same degree. In my last article in the JOURNAL, I wrote of the world of Grandma Moses, and the fact that one usually found in it a widowed grandmother or other relative, for whom there was "always room for one more." But that world was different. The home was not only a residence for a family gathered in their more intimate hours. It was a center of industry, in which young and old all had something useful and creative to do. The family lived in a community, which was a visible extension of the families. Everyone knew everyone else for miles around, and life was co-operative on a neighborly basis.

The farmhouses I described were uncomfortable by modern standards, but they were large. Few homes today have guest rooms, and a guest means doubling up, or turning a living room into a bedroom by night. We have sacrificed space to comfort, and by numerous laborsaving devices refinement of taste has increased. The modern woman does not do so much hard manual labor as her grandmother, but she is a more, not less, conscientious housekeeper. Grandma cleaned house in the spring and fall, and what a scrubbing and rubbing and polishing it was! But after that all it got for months was an occasional lick and polish. Her granddaughter—with numerous mechanical aids—expects her home to be tidy and immaculate every day.

Grandma served abundant meals, but with little variety, and nobody having tasted anything else except "good solid American food," everybody liked the same things. Her granddaughter searches the magazines for new recipes—from all the European countries and the Orient as well. So tastes differ as they never did before, and especially between the generations.

Grandma's recreations were homemade. Granddaughter's are not. Even families consisting only of parents and their minor children are coming to have more than one television set and radio, in order that everyone should be pleased.

Life is lived more outside the home, in both work and recreations, so the harder to keep it together, the more cherished is family intimacy, and the more disturbing the introduction of another generation.

Why and under what circumstances do the elderly go to live with their children?

I know of no statistical studies, but observation indicates that it is rarely a question of money. Social Security, private insurance and industrial retirement pensions provide for the old as never before. Usually one mate has died and the survivor is alone. And usually he, or she, has nothing to do. The combination of these leads them to seek the roofs and companionship of their adult children.

The fact that they are idle and have no work exacerbates the situation. The father of the family is away from nine to five. But the guest and housemate is home and underfoot all day. Grandma may baby-sit, but to care for a prolonged time for a lively two- or three-year-old taxes the physical strength of the youngest and heartiest. Grandparents who have brought up their own children are, with the rarest exceptions, unable to care for young children. It is simply too hard—far harder than regular work in a shop or office. And grandpa is likely to be of no use at all.

But why are the elderly, able-bodied though they be, lonely and idle?

Here we come to the crux of the matter.

I have had more trouble with myself than with any other man I have ever met.

DWIGHT L. MOODY
in Twice Thirty, by Edward Bok
(Charles Scribner's Sons)

It has become a matter of policy that everyone should cease working at the age of sixty-five, regardless of the individual condition. The Social Security laws encourage this by putting a premium on retirement. The pension schemes of industry require it. An employee is automatically retired.

Advertisements of insurance companies paint a rosy picture of the life of the retired beneficiary: the little house in Florida, Southern California or some other mild climate; fishing, bridge, a leisurely game of golf. Institutions exist into which the elderly can buy their way—to live exclusively among others as old as or older than themselves. The old are encouraged to cultivate hobbies—anything to get them out of the main stream of life.

There are, I have read, savage tribes of hunter warriors who push the old over cliffs when they are no longer able to hunt and fight, these being the sole occupations—though this is not true of any primitive peoples of whom I have knowledge. Among Polynesians and Arabs, as among the ancient Hebrews, the old are cherished for their wisdom. They are the heeded counselors of the tribe and the community.

But in our society we are really pushing the old over the cliff, in however "civilized" and "humane" a way.

The fact is that few who have been active all their lives are capable of enjoying total leisure. Ours is not a leisure society and the creative use of leisure is not something one can begin to cultivate at sixty. We are a nation of workers. And in this particular society and time, those who are entirely cut off from the world of work are cut off from life itself.

Our most vital contacts are with our fellow workers. They are not all our age. In factory or office we work alongside young people just out of high school, vocational school or college; middle-aged people, and older. It is a vital community of work and interest. Even our social contacts are largely with Adam and Eve ate the first vitamins, including the package.

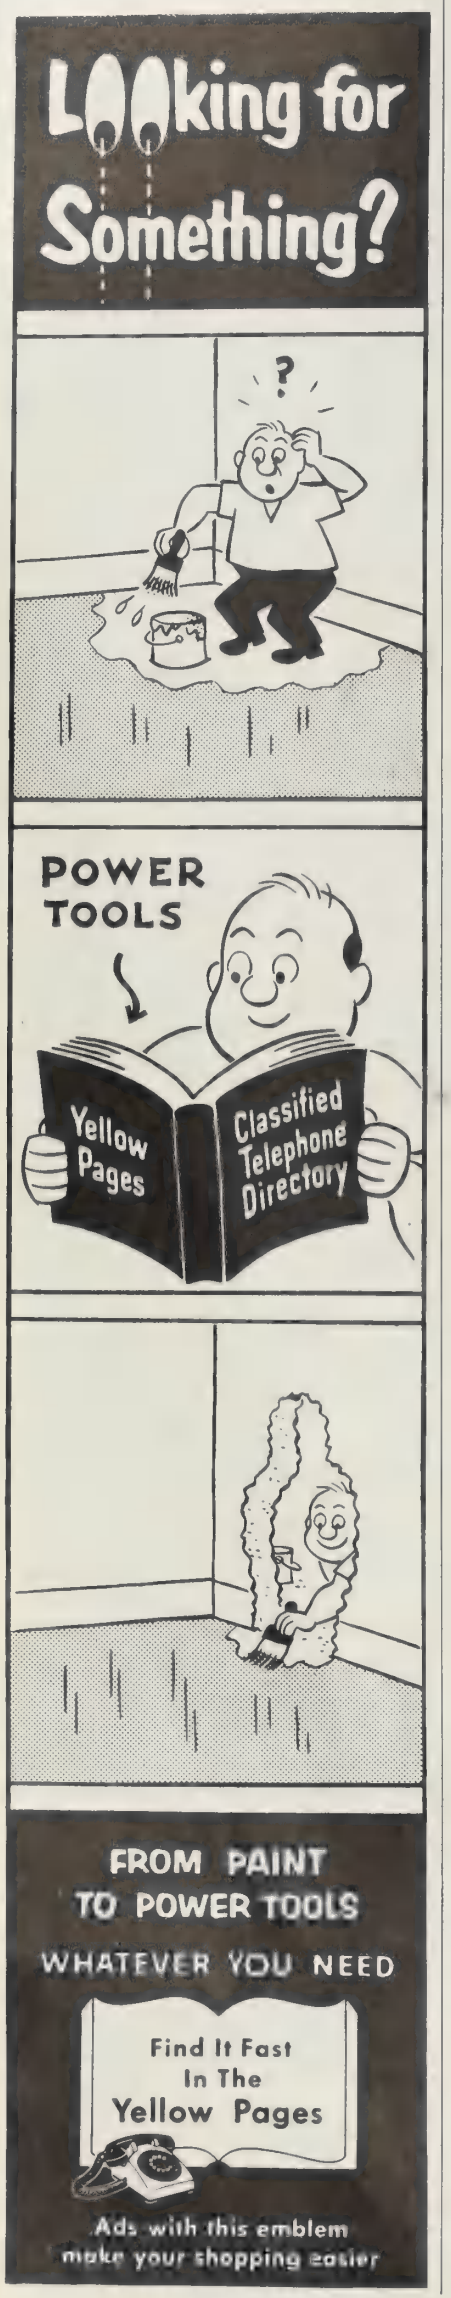
The best way to buy vitamins is in the original packages manufactured by nature—in fruits, vegetables, eggs, milk, meats, fish and whole-grain cereals. People who do not eat enough of these protective foods may appear to be well fed, but they cannot do their best work and get the most pleasure out of living, because of vitamin deficiencies. Vitamin capsules or tablets taken daily as a diet supplement help to make up such vitamin deficiencies.



Look with distrust, however, on any suggestion of self-medication with vitamins to cure any condition. Do not run the risk of letting some serious disease go too long while you fool yourself by taking vitamins which may have nothing to do with your case.

No vitamin can cure disease of the nerves, bones, blood, liver, kidneys, heart or digestive tract except in certain cases which only a doctor can recognize and treat. If you are sick see your doctor. Let him use his skill and judgment to decide what you need.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Suburbia, that new-fashioned layer of modern life which is so rapidly spreading and thickening around us, and doubtless changing the outlook and character of our young people, is a controversial subject. To nearly all nonsuburbanites it seems an excrescence. To those who have really suffered, it is a sociological horror. To some of its inhabitants, it is a laugh.

WILL NOT RUN FEB. 22ND, by Caskie Stinnett (Rinehart), is the commuter's slant. Someone said that the commuter is a man whose creed is to get to the station and board the train without missing a step. That is Mr. Stinnett and his hundreds of trainmates.

Although the commuters travel vast distances in their lifetime, their fiercely beating wings, according to Mr. Stinnett, never lift them an inch. This book of his is funny—in the Benchley tradition: on how to select a seatmate, how to steal a newspaper, how to get rid of the newcomer who sits in on the bridge game . . . a book for one commuter to recommend to another, but not to be mentioned by the city dweller, especially the traitor who has moved back from the suburbs.

The serious book is THE CRACK IN THE PICTURE WINDOW, by John Keats (Houghton Mifflin). This is a documented disclosure of the evils of the new housing developments that are now growing up in compact circles around all our American cities. He points out the slipshod building, the all-too-frequent swindling of the young men and their brides and coming families, the deadliness of living in such intimacy with people with whom one has nothing in common but income, and the matriarchal system that eventually prevails. The men sleep in their houses, and spend short weekends in them. All the rest of the week from dawn to dusk the women have to fight it out alone.

It can't all be as bad as Mr. Keats (of Washington, D.C.) has found it, but by their very nature these communities not only keep young people in debt most of their lives, but spiritually destroy their individuality.

To most Americans, February means Abraham Lincoln. It means George Washington too. But we are closer to the dramatic years that surrounded Lincoln, and our reading interest in the Civil War has of late risen to a high peak. Every month a book comes out on some phase of those terrible years, but none represents such a comprehensive and understanding picture of the whole war (from the Union side) as THIS HALLOWED GROUND, by Bruce Catton (Doubleday).

As all Civil War readers know, Mr. Catton has written other fine books on his way to this final appraisal—A Stillness at Appomattox, Mr. Lincoln's Army, U. S. Grant and the American Military Tradition. And in this latest book lie all the glory and all the tragedy of that period, and an understanding and clarification of the meaning of the war and of the issues at stake that only such an informed specialist could give us. If you have not yet ventured forth on the Civil War, it's my advice that you start here. If you know it well, this could be the final considered word.

THE LAST ANGRY MAN, by Gerald Green (Scribner), is what we used to call a strong novel. It covers the smart Connecticut circle of an ambitious huckster (a TV advertising man with a highly paid executive point of view) and the Brownsville section of Brooklyn, now largely inhabited by Negroes, where an old hard-worked Jewish doctor holds forth, a man of unquestioned integrity but of not very much patience (the Angry Man).

The story which brings these two widely separated grooves together delves deep. It is not easy to take—this strictly up-to-the-minute way of dealing with language, sex and morals—but neither is life pure and attractive among the poor and underprivileged, nor in the offbeat pleasures of the overindulged.

•

An amusing book, for a nonneurotic convalescent maybe, is MR. WEBSTER'S BLOOMERS (Morrow), by John Bailey and Helen and J. C. Furnas. It's a nonsense dictionary: "What would a word mean if it didn't?" Like antarctic, an Eskimo's aunt; coterie, a checkroom; tut-tut, two famous kings of Egypt; cobra, a brassière for Siamese twins.

One of the most rewarding books out this winter is THE ECHO OF GREECE (Norton), by Edith Hamilton, author of The Greek Way.

There seems to be a kinship with ancient Greece in nearly all of us who have been exposed to Western culture, and in these two books Miss Hamilton goes a long way toward explaining this bond. It lies in common ideals of freedom, self-control, fairness and true democracy. In the second book she shows the gradual decline in this firm set of principles that started in the fourth century B.C. She writes of Plato and Aristotle, Demosthenes, Alexander the Great, the Stoics and Plutarch, against that changing world.

•

On the lighter side, but still breathing of the blue Attic sky and the wine-colored sea, is MERMAID SINGING, by Charmian Clift (Bobbs-Merrill). This is the actual present-day adventure of a young English couple, both writers, who threw up all the accouterments of their London life, boarded a plane with their two children, and took off for an island of Greece. There they lived for over a year, all four of them adjusted, happy, busy, healthy. Life may not have been entirely idyllic as they met their first problems head on, but looking back—and from the reader's vantage—it was a dream come true.

IT BURNS ME UP

MY MOTHER IS IN THERE!

To Journal Readers: I know she's in there. I see her every day. Yesterday I saw her in so many places I couldn't eat my dinner. Not because your mother's so unpleasant—she's forgetful and rather querulous, but she's not unpleasant. It's the foul holes you let her live in.

I'm a visiting nurse. I try to keep clean, reasonably healthy and contented many of the old folks sitting out the bleak years of their lives in boarding homes. We have twelve million people over sixty-five in our country, or about eight in every hundred persons. The county where I work contains three times the national average.

Now I'm not blaming you for keeping your mother in a boarding home. Not many people put their families there just to get them out of the way. Modern architects, however, are designing homes only for pixies, so there's no room for mother. Our corporations are also sending their bright young minds all over the country; and mother wants to stay where her roots are deep. Or she may look forward to living in her church home, but be No. 423 on the waiting list.

Here are a few of your mothers I've met:

There is Mrs. Alderson, who lives in a "guest home" which seems strikingly superior at first glance. (It should, at $75 weekly.) No smell of cabbage or unwashed human flesh, no wrangling voices greet the nurse at the front door. A bright couch and gay pillows contrast with wall-to-wall broadloom. Only later does the nurse discover that the divan keeps its shape because no one is allowed to sit on it, that there is no noise because there is a rule that all doors must be shut tight. People as deaf as Mrs. Alderson are not allowed to turn up their radios to hearing range.

Or take Mrs. Ames. I found her lying in a pool of urine on a plastic mattress cover, weakly trying to pull her torn cotton gown over her buttocks. The radiator in her room had been turned off. When I asked the landlady for bedclothes, she wouldn't have your mother "messing my good sheets and blankets." Since I wasn't allowed near the kitchen stove for hot water, I sponged your mother off as best I could with cold water from the filthy sink in the hall—and begged a dry gown from another tenant. I left her cleaner but no warmer.

Mrs. Williams is cold too. Since she tears and hides her clothes, the management has stopped giving her any. She sits on a rubber sheet smiling foolishly, when she isn't crawling around the floor. One of the three other elderly women crowded into that attic room begged me to see that Mrs. Williams was taken somewhere for proper care. When the fire inspectors come, she is taken downstairs for the day. Shall we let your mother burn to cinders? It would solve a lot of problems.

And what shall we do with Mrs. Graves? What is the sense of washing her once a week when we have to put her back into garments stiff with foulness? The landlady is too busy running a bazaar for her church to have time for Mrs. Graves' laundry. I try to persuade Mrs. Graves to stay in bed and let the nurse wash her undergarments, but she won't hear of it. Someone would steal them while they were drying.

Mrs. Schwartz's rooming house isn't bad. The surroundings are clean and the owner brings up her meals. But the landlady likes money very much indeed. The house has a legal number of fire exits, but the rooms are so jammed with beds that anyone escaping from a fire would have quite an obstacle course. The owner likes all kinds of people too—even people who need a different kind of care than she is qualified to give. She was exploding about it yesterday: "That Mrs. Heinz will drive me crazy! She had another fit and fell

CHURCHILL WOKE HIM WITH TELEPHONE CALLS

The last chance to avoid World War II . . . The truth about Munich . . .

Mr. Churchill's monosyllables

By LORD Halifax

III Anthony Eden resigned the Foreign Secretaryship in February, 1938, and I was appointed to succeed him. Accidents of various kinds had, however, already been connecting me with foreign affairs, and I had indeed very nearly found myself Foreign Secretary some years earlier. It had happened like this:

I had returned from India in April, 1931, and through the summer had been enjoying a complete holiday from work and from responsibility. I was therefore in no way concerned, any more than any casual pedestrian in Piccadilly, with the autumn crisis of 1931 which was to be the occasion of the disappearance of the Labour Government and, after a brief emergency arrangement, of the formation of the National Government in its place.

At this stage I received one morning a request that I should call to see Baldwin. This I did and there learned the reason for my summons. Ramsay MacDonald had had to go off to Scotland and had commissioned Baldwin to invite me to be Foreign Secretary. I told Baldwin that I thought there were particular reasons why my appointment at that moment would be from his point of view ill judged. I had just returned from India and was much like the proverbial red rag to many of the more right-wing Conservatives. It would be the duty of the Foreign Secretary to do his best to carry the country in favor of some plan of disarmament, and for any such talk, difficult as it must anyhow be, I should inevitably start with an unfavorable handicap. Baldwin listened to all this and then said, "I'm not sure you may not be right. I will have a word with Bobby Monsell and tell you at luncheon, where we are to meet." And when we did meet, he said that he had made his inquiry and the result was to support my view. So the appointment to the Foreign Office went elsewhere and I continued to enjoy my holiday till the late summer of 1932, when I joined Ramsay MacDonald's Government as Minister of Education. Three years later Baldwin took over and appointed me to the War Office.

In the few months that I was there I was able for the first time to get the army picture of our weakness in armament, which was substantially reproduced in both the other services. A word must be intruded as to how this had arisen. After the 1914 war had ended with the total disarmament of Germany, there had been established with cabinet authority, for the guidance of service departments in framing policy and estimates, a conventional condition that there would be no major war for ten years. In the early years after the war this was not unreasonable, and in those years economy was not incompatible with security. But during Baldwin's first Government, when Churchill was Chancellor of the Exchequer, a much wider and more dangerous extension of the rule's meaning was adopted, by which the ten years were no longer to be reckoned from one fixed date, but from a date perpetually moving forward without time limit.

This rule—or rather this interpretation of the rule—coincided with the mood into which British people always lapse after a war, of thinking that there will never be any more war and that therefore they can safely cut down on their armaments. The advent of Hitler to power in 1933 had coincided with a high tide of wholly irrational pacifist sentiment in Britain, which caused profound damage both at home and abroad. At home it immensely aggravated the difficulty, great in any case as it was bound to be, of bringing the British people to appreciate and face up to the new situation which Hitler was creating; abroad it doubtless served to tempt him and others to suppose that in shaping their policies this country need not be too seriously regarded.

Apart from these political consequences I do not think, when I went to the War Office, that anyone outside the official world realized how great had been the damage wrought by the double operation of interpretation and mood upon our armament industry and our consequent capacity for war. And this was 1935, two years after Hitler had attained full power in Germany.

After the election of that year, I moved from the War Office to be Lord Privy Seal, which post I held through the unhappy events of the winter, involving Hoare's resignation from the Foreign Office, and through King Edward VIII's abdication up to the time that Baldwin, with the King's approval, handed over the Prime Ministership to Neville Chamberlain. I saw Baldwin regularly through those gloomy days and learned at close quarters how much King and country and commonwealth were indebted to him for the steadiness with which he held in so true a balance his responsibilities to each. When he resigned after the Coronation in the following year, I wrote to wish him officially good-by and had this letter back, which gives a glimpse of the romantic, almost mystical, streak in his composition:

69, Eaton Square, S. W.
8th June 1937

My dear Edward: I shall value your letter as long as I live. Our friendship has been a very real thing to me and a real influence which I treasure.

This last ten days have been a strange time: a time that comes only once and cannot recur.

All hearts seem open for the moment: most will close again, some perhaps be kept ajar, but it is very wonderful. I feel tired, happy and at peace: and mighty humble. I wish my dear Dickens hadn't destroyed what is really a very beautiful word: but you will know all I mean by it.

I still have that sense of wonder that the Blessed Damozel shewed in her face as she leaned over the gold bar of Heaven. It wore off: so will mine. But it leaves something good, I hope, behind.

I hope indeed we may see something of each other: it will be a joy to me.

I won't say more: I am sitting among stacks of letters, but they are diminishing: but may all good be with you for long years.

Ever yours,
S.B.

When Neville Chamberlain formed his Government, I became Lord President of the Council, and there remained till I went to the Foreign Office on Eden's resignation in February, 1938. Occupying an office that was not burdened with any of the day-to-day work of a department, I was untrammeled by any immediate administrative duty, and therefore able to do any other work with which the Prime Minister might wish me to help.

In this way I came to be a good deal associated with what Eden was doing at the Foreign Office, and was free to sit in with him at some of the international meetings which, as now, claimed so large a portion of the Foreign Secretary's time. Nothing then or since gave me any reason to think that such help as I might have been able to give was other than congenial to him. There was never the shadow of friction between us, and I came greatly to respect his many qualities of head and heart.

Certainly there was, so far as I am aware, no foundation in his thought or in mine for the legend that whispering mischief-makers were concerned from time to time to propagate about such collaboration being a means devised by Baldwin, or later Chamberlain, to keep control over the Foreign Secretary. The relationship that we established was one of complete trust and mutual confidence, and not one to lend itself to any other purpose.

Eden resigned in February, 1938, and his doing so was both cause of profound regret to his friends in the government, and a severe blow to Chamberlain's administration. I have repeatedly gone back over the ground, looking for the real reason that prompted his decision, but I have never felt quite satisfied that I had discovered the whole answer.

It certainly was not the case that his relationship with the Prime Minister had been uneasy and strained from the beginning, for I recall how he felt when Chamberlain was taking over from Baldwin in the previous year. Eden had frequently been tried by Baldwin's reluctance to involve himself in the discussion of the foreign business that he brought up, and thought, I expect, that this imposed upon him an unfair burden; and when the changeover was taking place, Eden spoke to me of what a great relief it would be to have a Prime Minister who would take some interest in the foreign side.

No doubt, as in most cases of the sort, resignation was a single consequence of a good many rather complex causes. There was almost certainly an element of irritation at what seemed to him Chamberlain's rather amateur intrusions into the Italian field through the medium of Lady Chamberlain's friendship with Mussolini, dating from Locarno days; a reluctance to pretend to any confidence, that he would be quite unable to feel, in any promises Mussolini might make; a sense of alienation from Chamberlain, who in his simplicity appeared to Eden to suppose that a self-respecting British policy could conceivably be built of material so flimsy; and lastly, I fancy, no small continuing resentment at what he had judged the cavalier treatment by Chamberlain of a démarché made somewhat earlier by President Roosevelt, while Eden was having a short holiday abroad.

It has frequently been asserted that Chamberlain's reply to the President's tentative suggestion of calling an international conference amounted to a rebuff which had grave consequences for the world, and, supported as it has been by Churchill, this legend is in danger of passing into history. For legend I am convinced it is. Lord Templewood has given the full story of this episode, based on all the relevant papers and material, with reference both to the acknowledged limitations of United States policy at that date as well as to the actual effect produced upon the mind of the President, and on that of Mr. Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State.

I am satisfied that on neither count is it possible to maintain the argument that has been advanced, in support of the conclusion either that the President felt resentment at the reception accorded to his initiative, or that his initiative, if differently handled, might have had the effect of preventing war. Here indeed, if the matter had a share in making the breach between Chamberlain and Eden, the latter was more royalist than the King, in that there is no evidence to suggest that Eden's irritation was shared by the individual principally concerned.

In reinforcement of such a judgment, I was to get a curious echo of this business, as it happened, from the President himself two or three years later in the United States. Eden was coming over for the first time, and I had gone to see Roosevelt about the visit. The President had never met Eden, and asked me a lot of questions about him. These I answered and then dilated a little upon my own regard for Eden, upon how closely we had worked together, and in how public-spirited a fashion he had behaved in relation to myself after his own resignation.

Other people's harvests are always the best harvests, but one's children are always the best children. MENCIUS

By way of giving what I said a somewhat personal point for the President, I told him that one of the reasons which had been quite powerful in influencing Eden's resignation from Chamberlain's Government had been the fact that he thought Chamberlain had handled badly a proposal put forward by the President while he, Eden, had been away on holiday.

To all this the President listened, much as one does when one is waiting for the other person to stop in order to say something more interesting oneself. When I did stop, the President said to me, "Did you ever see the telegram I sent to Chamberlain at the time of Munich?" I said I supposed I had seen it, but would he refresh my mind? "The shortest telegram I ever sent," said the President—"two words: 'Good man.'" All of which throws a different and a good deal less dramatic light on the President's feeling about Chamberlain than that which has been sometimes ascribed to him.

It was with the greatest reluctance that I agreed to accept the post left vacant by Eden's resignation. Up to the last two or three years I had never had any special contact with Foreign Office work, but these years had given me ample opportunity of seeing how thankless in present circumstances the work of any Foreign Secretary was bound to be. The annexation of Austria, which greeted me very soon after I had taken over in March, 1938, came as an unpleasant reminder of the way the Nazi Government of Germany was likely to handle other European questions, and through the summer the German chorus of denunciation of Czechoslovakian misdeeds steadily swelled.

I have no wish to rewrite the history of events that culminated in Munich. No one who had the misfortune to preside over the Foreign Office at that time could ever for one moment of the twenty-four hours of each day forget that he had little or nothing in his hands with which to support his diplomatic efforts. The British people had through years of wishful thinking come to believe that because they so clearly recognized war to be a bad plan, everybody else must recognize it for such too.

Services and industry alike had been hampered by the formula writing down the risk of war, and thus the Foreign Secretary was like a player invited to stake, when he knew that if the fortune of the game turned against him he had nothing with which to redeem his pledge. Almost every day I would receive unsolicited advice to take some action, of which the plain consequence, if the bluff did not succeed, was to make it rather more likely that the issue must be war. Under such pressure one was tempted to remember the advice that one used to be given when one began to take an independent line fox hunting: never to jump into a field unless you have a pretty good idea where you can jump out.

The criticism excited by Munich never caused me the least surprise. I should very possibly, indeed, have been among the critics myself, if I had not happened to be in a position of responsibility. But there were two or three considerations to which those same critics ought to have had regard. One was that in criticizing the settlement of Munich, they were criticizing the wrong thing and the wrong date. They ought to have criticized the failure of successive governments, and of all parties, to foresee the necessity of rearming in the light of what was going on in Germany; and the right date on which criticism ought to have fastened was 1936, which had seen the German reoccupation of the Rhineland in defiance of treaty provisions.

I have little doubt that if we had then told Hitler bluntly to go back, his power for future and larger mischief would have been broken. But, leaving entirely aside the French, there was no section of British public opinion that would not have been directly opposed to such action in 1936. To go to war with Germany for walking into their own back yard, which was how the British people saw it—at a time, moreover, when you were actually discussing with them the dates and conditions of their right to resume occupation—was not the sort of thing people could understand. So that moment which, I would guess, offered the last effective chance of securing peace without war went by.

The other element that gave fuel to the fires of criticism was the unhappy phrases which Neville Chamberlain under the stress of great emotion allowed himself to use. "Peace with honor"; "Peace for our time"—such phrases grated harshly on the ear and thought of even those closest to him. And almost immediately afterward, as his biographer reminds us, he was begging the House of Commons not to read too much into words used under conditions of strain so exhausting and so profound.

But when all has been said, one fact remains dominant and unchallengeable. When war did come a year later it found a country and commonwealth wholly united within itself, convinced to the foundations of soul and conscience that every conceivable effort had been made to find the way of sparing Europe the ordeal of war, and that no alternative remained. And that was the big thing that Chamberlain did.

In this connection Churchill did Chamberlain less than justice in his war history. He says:

"Chamberlain returned to England. . . . He waved the joint declaration which he had got Hitler to sign. . . . As his car drove through cheering crowds . . . he said to Halifax . . . 'All this will be over in three months'; but from the windows of Downing Street he waved his piece of paper again and used these words . . . 'I believe it is peace for our time.'"

The implication of that sentence can har- be other than that Chamberlain was concern to mislead the public into the acceptance o belief which he did not himself share; wher of course in fact his two remarks referred two totally different things. I was the o person with him when he made the first servation and was instrumental in giving information to Professor Feiling, from wh biography Churchill has quoted the word am therefore in the best position to know w Chamberlain meant by it. When he said " this will be over in three months," he was ferring to the popular enthusiasm of the ment; when he spoke about "peace for time," he was concerned with the spirit which he believed Hitler to have signed declaration and which at that moment he disposed to trust. Chamberlain no doubt his faults, and the words that he used ab Hitler as he spoke to the crowd in Down Street were soon to be roughly denied by event. But no one could fairly charge him lack of frankness.

One other fragment of conversation th had with him on that drive from Hesto perhaps worth recording. It was not easy talk at all, for flowers were being thrown the car, people w jumping on the ning board, seizing hand and patting on the back. But lull I remember sa to him that there two things whi wished to leave ir mind before we into London. One that he would t find people who w urge him very stro to have an immed election, which t advisers would rec mend as being gre in the interest of Conservative Part told him that I thou he ought to resist counsel, for he wa longer only a p leader: for better worse, what he just done had n him a national le and he must act accordingly. From that deed followed the second thing I wante say—which was that by the time he met House of Commons on Monday (in three time) he ought to have reconstituted his ernment, bringing in Labour if they w join, and Churchill and Eden.

He seemed surprised, but said he w think it over. Nothing, however, happe and I have often wondered whether or hov course of history might have been chang he had acted in the sense that I sugge Labour leaders would have been no doub luctant to join him, as he was for them a cult personality, but in the particular cir stances of the moment it is possible that feeling would have had to yield.

The case, indeed, for a Government of tional Unity, if such could have been cre received early reinforcement. Very soon sky became overcast, as the tone of Hi public speaking became noticeably and gressively more sharp, and in December, we received a mysterious communication Berlin which was to acquire an added int in the light of subsequent events and of knowledge.

One of the Embassy staff was invited secrecy to meet a German staff officer, whom he was friendly, after dark in the garten, the Hyde Park of Berlin. This h cordingly did. The German officer then him that Hitler had given orders for preparation of plans for an all-out air a on England, for use in certain eventual such plans to be ready by the middle of M If and when further order was to be give this attack to be made, the German o proposed to communicate by a home code of sending to his Embassy friend a t page of the Berlin telephone book. On re-ipt of this information steps were at once ken to accelerate production, and the events March, though not accompanied by the ge of the telephone book, left little doubt of hat was shaping in Hitler's mind and marked urning point in Chamberlain's thought.

As to the true purpose of the Soviet Gov-nment during those months before the war, inion will no doubt continue to differ. Those o are disposed to be critical of everything amberlain did will feel that by refusal to ree with it on points arising in the negotia-ns concerning the Baltic states or Poland Romania, he confirmed it in its mistrust British policy, and thus pushed it into the er alternative of reaching an accommoda-n with Hitler.

I never believed in 1939 that this was a cor-t diagnosis, nor has anything that has ppened since given me cause to change my w. I thought that Russian policy then, as w, was entirely inspired by what Stalin, or oever decided Soviet policy, judged to be Russia's interest, and that in this assess-nt of interest there were two principal ments. One was the strong desire to see the covery by Russia of territories lost after the st war, so that the dictator of Russia's licy would appear to his people as the Peter Great of the twentieth century. The other mpelling thought in the mind of the Kremlin 1939 must surely have been the imperative cessity of buying time; this to complete the viet five-year plan, restore the army, develop lustry and so on, against the evil day which s probably bound to me, but which might be t off till conditions were s unfavorable.

Every argument that is d against Chamberlain regard to British and nch unpreparedness and nsequent incapacity to e fighting reality to the lish guaranties was ely in Soviet thought, d from the Soviet point of view there must ve seemed to be singularly little to set ainst the very real danger of exposing them-ves at that moment to German attack. For se reasons I gravely doubt whether any-ng that we or the French could have said done in 1939 would have had the smallest ect in leading Russia to accept a position culated to invite sharp and early reaction m the German side. Nor would anything the later development of the Soviet attitude world problems, admittedly under different t for them vastly more favorable condi-ns, suggest that Soviet policy was likely n any more than now to have been greatly ected by quixotic impulse or considerations high international principle.

n August 21st, a cryptic message was re-ved from Germany suggesting that Goering uld come over to London, provided he uld be assured that he would be able to see Prime Minister. After discussion it was cided to send an affirmative answer to this rious suggestion, and arrangements were cordingly set in hand for Goering to come er secretly on Wednesday, August 23rd. e idea was that he should land at some used airdrome, be picked up in a car and ken direct to Chequers. There the regular usehold was to be given congé for two or ree days and the telephone was to be dis-nnected while the visit took place. No an-er, however, came till Thursday, August th, when a message was received to the ef-t that Hitler did not think it would be mediately useful. Nothing further there-re happened, and except that it was ob-usly wrong to neglect any chance, however promising, I think we all felt it resembled ge melodrama rather than even the fever-diplomacy that immediately precedes the tastrophe of war.

Thus the days crept heavily on to Septem-r 1st, when the news came of the German vasion of Poland, and His Majesty's overnment at once intimated to the German overnment that unless all aggression against Poland was suspended and German troops withdrawn from Polish territory, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would at once fulfill their obligations to Poland.

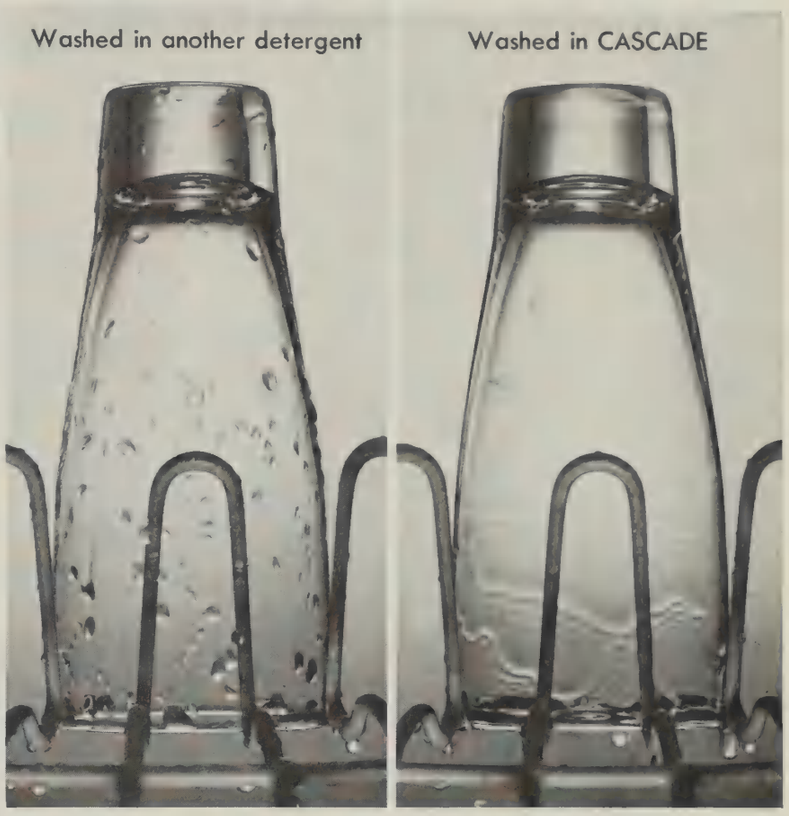
Throughout that Friday (September 1st) and Saturday, we had considerable difficulty with the French Government over the timing of the ultimatum to Germany, which we wished to synchronize with them, but they, for reasons connected with mobilization, wanted to delay. This was responsible both for the postponement of the advertised time for making the statement on Saturday evening in both Houses and also for the lack of mention in it of any definite time limit, on which we said that we were in consultation with the French. This statement went all right in the House of Lords, but very badly in the House of Commons, where mischief-makers were quick to suggest that the reason both for the delay which had preceded the statement and for the lack of mention of a specific time limit for the expiry of the ultimatum was that the two governments were planning another surrender.

The evening of that day, September 2nd, was of all evenings that I can remember the most miserable. I had just got back from the House of Lords and was going out to get some dinner with Dorothy at 8:30 when the Prime Minister rang up on the telephone to ask me to go down to Downing Street at once. The statement, he said, had gone very badly in the House of Commons, people misinterpreting the inability to give a time limit to be the result of halfheartedness and hesitation on our part, and concluding with a very unpleasant scene in which much feeling had been shown. I had never known Chamberlain so disturbed.

I accordingly went straight off to No. 10, where he gave me dinner. He told me that the statement had infuriated the House and that he did not believe, unless we could clear the position, that the government would be able to maintain itself when it met Parliament the next day. We got hold of Alec Cadogan, the permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, who had eaten half his own dinner at home, and was given the other half to eat at No. 10, and after dinner we asked M. Corbin, the French ambassador, to join us. Then followed an hour of frantic telephoning to the French Government, Daladier and Bonnet, and to our ambassador in Paris, Sir Eric Phipps, with the object of getting an agreement to give the Germans as short a time limit as possible.

Finally the cabinet met at 11:30, continuing till about 1:30 A.M. Sunday morning, by which time everybody's nerves were rather frayed. So far as I was concerned, the last straw was when I went across to the Foreign Office after the cabinet, to send a final instruction to the ambassador in Berlin, and met a prominent member of the Labour Party coming out of the building. As we passed in the passage, he, still in the House of Commons atmosphere, said to me, "Foreign Secretary, can you give me any hope?" to which I replied, "If you mean hope of a war I think I can promise you a certainty for tomorrow"; to which in turn he replied, "Thank God."

So we passed into the war of which all the outward circumstances through that first winter of 1939–40 were so different from what everybody had expected. For most people the blackout was the consequence most directly felt, since the number of troops going across to France in that first winter was comparatively small; there was little outward activity by land or in the air, and the anxieties that must have been always present in the minds of the Admiralty were not for some time to be matter of daily concern to the general public.



I imagine that it is commonly thought—I remember indeed once thinking so myself—that the outbreak of hostilities automatically terminates or restricts the activities of the Foreign Office, as the diplomatic efforts of peace have to yield to the arbitrament of war. But this is by no means the case. There is of

"TOGETHER WE GOT RID OF 77½ POUNDS AND LOVED IT"

Sisters Lillian Lang and Aida Krause of New York tell how they improved their figures with the famous Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan

"Here we are before we discovered the famous Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan."

"Today we like ourselves much better, and so do our husbands and children."

Read their own story

"We used to look at each other and joke about our figures. But, honestly, we hated being overweight, and several times we tried various ways to reduce. We love good food, and we just couldn't stick very long to those monotonous diets. Other reducing gadgets didn't help much, either.

"A friend told us about the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan, and skeptically we started in. Well, after only three weeks of it, one was down 14 pounds, the other 11. But, best of all, we found it actually was fun. The Knox Choice-of-Foods Chart let us pick and choose most of the foods we like best. Three good meals a day, even desserts, and between-meal snacks, too.

"We used lots of recipes in the Eat-and-Reduce book and followed the easy rules. Our husbands loved these meals, too. We did our housework and took care of our children as usual, and each week we seemed to have more pep—weren't all tired out by nighttime as we had been before. The doctor weighed and measured us as we went along, and the news was wonderful. Today one of us is 42½ pounds lighter, the other 35 pounds lighter. Today, one's hips are 8¼ inches less around, the other's waist is 5½ inches less. Our friends can hardly believe it, and now, at least a dozen of them are on the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan. As for us, we never felt better in our lives."

ENJOY YOUR FOOD AND LOSE 2 TO 5 POUNDS A WEEK

Don't think you can't enjoy the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan as Mrs. Krause and Mrs. Lang did. course little to be done by the Foreign Office in the way of direct contact with enemy governments, beyond the regulation of routine business consequent upon the rupture of relations. The necessary exchanges with Allied powers, in so far as these are outside the scope of service departments, continue, of course, to fall to the Foreign Office, but it is with powers that are still neutral that the principal business has to be done. And with many of these it is greatly increased, for at almost every point war is bound to disturb the normal life of any nation whose conduct by the nature of its commercial business, or by cause of its geographical position, vitally affects one or other of the belligerents. Agreements have to be made; conventions established; the right blend of persuasion and threat has to be found, for every case differs from every other; efforts must be made to win support, or at least stave off active alignment with the enemy: all of which takes much time, so that the Foreign Secretary is seldom idle.

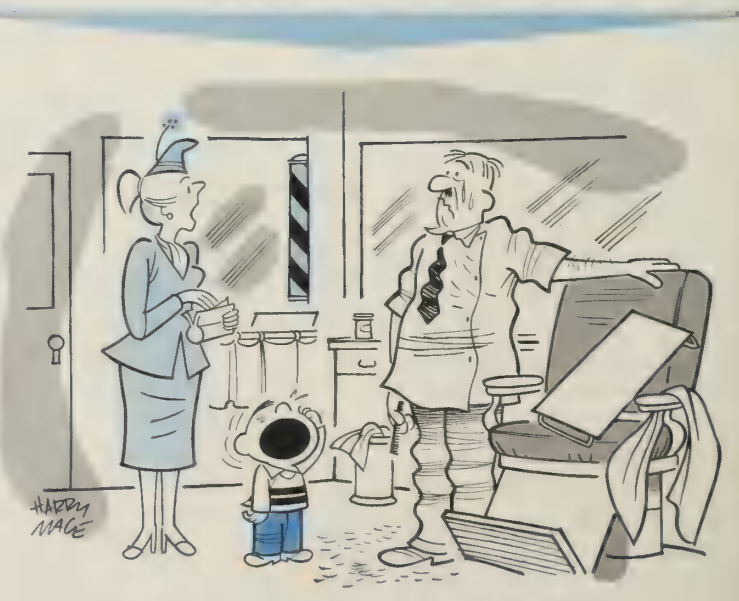
Of the passage of public events during the first months of the war I have little or nothing to tell that has not been well told already. The personal setting of our own life was, however, shifted in that, after hostilities had been in progress a little while, we were persuaded by Victor Cazalet to move from our house in Eaton Square, which by size and lack of staff had become quite unmanageable, to the Dorchester Hotel. There, accordingly, by the kindness of the owners of the hotel, we established ourselves, in a flat with a good deal of our own furniture and some of our own pictures, and under conditions which made it the more easy to see something of the several members of our family as they drifted into or out of or through London. Our two elder sons, Charles and Peter, went off in the early months of 1940 with their regiments to Palestine. Richard, our youngest son, had gone to Rome in February, 1940, through the kindness of Sir Percy Loraine, while Italy was still neutral, to work in some honorary capacity in the Embassy, until the time came for him to begin his military service.

At first it was the practice for the cabinet to meet daily, to hear such reports as there might be, and deal with any business arising. It gradually came to be felt, though, that, apart from the inconvenience involved in taking ministers away for an hour or two every day from their offices, this was not the way to get the best out of the human machine, and later it became usual for ministers of the cabinet to take three or four days off every few weeks by turn.

One such interlude early in June, 1940, is forever graven into my memory. It was just after the fall of France, an event which at the time it happened seemed something so unbelievable as to be almost surely unreal, and if not unreal then quite immeasurably catastrophic. Dorothy and I had spent a lovely summer evening walking over the Wolds, and on our way home sat in the sun for half an hour at a point looking across the plain of York. All the landscape of the nearer foreground was familiar—its sights, its sounds, its smells; hardly a field that did not call up some half-forgotten bit of association; the red-roofed village and nearby hamlets, gathered as it were for company round the old gray-stone church, where men and women like ourselves, now long dead and gone, had once knelt in worship and prayer.



Here in Yorkshire was a true fragment of the undying England, like the white cliffs of Dover, or any other part of our land that Englishmen have loved. Then the question came, is it possible that the Prussian jack boot will force its way into this countryside to tread and trample over it at will? The very thought seemed an insult and an outrage; much as if anyone were to be condemned to watch his mother, wife or daughter being raped.

Nor was it a thought that could be easily dismissed. All through this summer of 1940 time moved with agonizing slowness, as one by one we ticked off the days to the equinoctial gales of September, which for the British people became the accepted goal of comparative safety from invasion. For whatever may have been the best informed view at the time, and whatever we have since learned from German records, there was no shadow of doubt about the fact of the public expectation of invasion. In the light of what had happened in Holland, much thought, both official and unofficial, was given to the question of enemy airborne and parachute attempts. Local sportsmen came forward with suggestions of organizing themselves into parties to ride round lonely areas at dawn; obstacles were erected on main roads and open spaces to deny them as potential landing grounds for aircraft; signposts were taken down; church bells were silenced, to ring only in case of invasion alarm. I remember the King telling me that he intended always to carry a rifle in his car and that he proposed himself to do rifle practice in the gardens of Buckingham Palace. I ventured to remind His Majesty that he had graciously given me permission to walk through the gardens of the palace on my way to the Foreign Office and it would therefore be of great help if I might know what was likely to be His Majesty's shooting timetable.

September 7th was the day of the first large night attack on London, and we watched the beginning of this air battle on the operations board at the headquarters of Fighter Command. In the evening some friends had come to dinner and I am not likely to forget with what feelings we all gazed from the hotel roof upon a sky aflame with the glow of much of London burning.

It was a week later, on September 15th, that there took place what Churchill has described as one of the decisive battles of the war, of which his narrative can even today make the drama live again. But although the German all-out bid for air supremacy might have failed, they continued for a long time to deal death, or at least discomfort. It was, however, remarkable how little people in London allowed the air warfare to dislocate their ordinary life. The sirens would start every evening with great regularity between seven and eight and Dorothy, anxious for a bath before dinner, was always haunted by the story of the bomb which peeled off the outside wall, leaving the bathroom open to the world, to the great discomfiture of its lady occupant. But luckily she never had to suffer so humiliating a fate and life's routine proceeded.

I remember, too, an American friend dining with us and being deeply impressed by Mrs. Arthur James, who had also been one of our party and could not have been a day under seventy, preparing to walk home to Grafton Street, complete with tin hat, in total disregard of the air raid that was going on. She announced that she had no intention of allowing Hitler or anybody else to stop her seeing her friends or sleeping in her own bed. I fancy there were many like her.

Soon after the attack on London had started, Dorothy went down to the air-raid shelter of the hotel (I must, I think, have been kept at the Foreign Office) and there found a motley assortment of hotel residents, among them Doctor Weismann reading the Old Testament, and some foreign ambassador who, seeing the Foreign Secretary's wife, albeit in a dressing gown, thought it his duty to present to her some members of his junior staff.

Later, when the night attack was more severe, the hotel management encouraged us to sleep in a room underground, where little noise penetrated and which we were led to suppose was fairly bombproof. A select sleeping colony was gradually established, as in many other corners and recesses at the lower levels of the hotel. Our own company consisted of ourselves, Duff Cooper and his wife, Sir George Clerk, at one time ambassador in Paris, and one or two others. We all had beds behind screens; by polite fiction we ignored one another's existence, and quickly became acclimatized to one another's snores. It was quite comfortable and we all slept soundly.

My only trouble was that Churchill would occasionally through the hotel porter call me to the telephone, waking me out of my beauty sleep, to ask some question that I felt I should have answered with greater wisdom and certainly with better temper in the morning. As we woke, we clad ourselves in dressing gowns, picked up the bag of personal effects which always accompanied us in case we were bombed in the night, made our way to the lift, and so back to civilization.

On the domestic front, the first main landmark of the war was the replacement of Chamberlain's Government by that of Churchill in May, 1940. The debate on the lamentable passage of events in Norway had left large numbers of the government's supporters in the House of Commons in sullen mood, which was reflected in the final division on May 8th.

When I saw Chamberlain the next morning, he told me that he did not think the situation could be left as it was, and that it was essential somehow to restore confidence in the government. This he opined could only be achieved by having all parties in it, which with him I also judged to be essential. We then discussed the possibility of Labour being willing to serve under him and agreed that the chances were negligible. He said he would like to have a talk with Churchill and myself together in the afternoon.

We accordingly met at No. 10 at 4:30, David Margesson being also present. The Prime Minister recapitulated the position, saying he had made up his mind that he must go, and that either Churchill or I must take his place. He would serve under either. It would therefore be necessary to see the Labour people before they went to Bournemouth, where they were about to hold a party conference, and ask them whether they would, on principle, be prepared to join the government (a) under the present Prime Minister, or (b) under some other Prime Minister.

David Margesson said that unity was essential and that he did not think this could be secured under Chamberlain. He did not at that moment pronounce definitely between Churchill and myself.

I then said that I thought for the reasons given the Prime Minister must probably go, but that I had no doubt at all in my own mind that for me to succeed him would create a quite impossible situation. Apart altogether from Churchill's qualities as compared with my own at this particular juncture, what would in fact be my position? Churchill would be running defense, and in this connection one could not but remember how rapidly the relationship between Asquith and Lloyd George had broken down in the first war, and I should have no access to the House of Commons. The inevitable result would be that, outside both these points of vital contact, I should speedily become a more or less honorary Prime Minister, living in a kind of twilight just outside the things that really mattered.

I might if necessary have prayed in aid the experience of Lord Rosebery as Prime Minister with Sir William Harcourt leading the House of Commons, but Churchill, with suitable expressions of regard and humility having said he could not but feel the force of my words, the Prime Minister reluctantly and Churchill evidently with much less reluctance finished by accepting my view.

So there we left it for the time being, Churchill and I having a cup of tea in the garden while the Prime Minister kept some other appointment, before we also saw Attlee and Greenwood together at 6:15 P.M. When we met, Chamberlain put the position to them, and it was finally agreed that they should consult their executive on the following day upon the two points as to whether the Labour Party would join the Government either under Chamberlain or under somebody else.

At six o'clock the following morning (May 9th) the Belgian and Dutch ambassadors presented themselves at my rooms in the Dorchester Hotel to report the invasion of their countries, and these new developments left Chamberlain for a short time to feel that reconstruction of the government must stand over till the war situation was more stable. But this was plainly impossible, and the Labour Party having replied that they would not serve under him but would join in under somebody else, Chamberlain went to the King to resign his office and to advise sending for Churchill. A day later I received Churchill's invitation to carry on at the Foreign Office couched in terms of characteristic generosity and resolution.

Admiralty,
Whitehall,

My dear Edward: Now that I have taken up this task, I write to thank you for the chivalry and kindness with which you have treated me. The task I have assumed is one of sombre and dire consequence. No one knows better than you what weaknesses lie undisclosed, and we both have a full realisation of the dangers which crowd in upon us, and their problems, from every side. However, with your help and Neville's I do not shrink from the ordeal.

It gives me so much pleasure to feel that we shall be fighting this business through together to the end. I feel sure your conduct of Foreign Affairs is an essential element in our war strength. I am so grateful to you for being willing to continue your work in this great office of which you are at once the slave and the master, and that you will of course lead the H. of L.

I am assuming that I may count on this, and that no formal invitation is required from

Your sincere friend,
WINSTON S. CHURCHILL

I thus continued at the Foreign Office and as member of the war cabinet, though I persuaded the Prime Minister to relieve me of the leadership of the House of Lords, which I had given up when I first went to the Foreign

447 women took this test*
They soaked both hands in a detergent three times a day. They applied Jergens to their right hands only. In a few days, their untreated left hands were rough and red. Their right hands, treated with Jergens, were soft and white. No other lotion similarly tested proved so effective.

Penetrates deep down!
Jergens Lotion doesn't just "glove" hands with a greasy film, but penetrates deep down where the hurt begins. That's why it's so much more effective than lotions that merely coat the skin. Stops chapping, weather damage, too!

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

We still shovel snow and thaw the water bucket, but the yeast of growing things is unmistakable in February's air.

Here in New England, we view February in somewhat the same manner as troops storming a redoubt. We have endured the dark rains of late autumn, the deep snows of December, the killing cold of January.

Now we tighten our belts and face this season of most erratic weather. We get a deal of pleasure out of it. For when the weather bureau promises a blizzard, we are likely to get the February thaw. Skies look bland. Sun shines. Snow melts. We walk out with light jackets on and begin to feel spring will be early this year.

I look thoughtfully at the storm windows, thinking we might take them off this week. Jill begins to draw garden plans.

Sometimes I think this is like a shot in the arm, just to get us through what the rest of February and March will bring.

But it is lovely while it lasts. We walk for the mail, and the ditches at the edge of the old gray stone walls are running with chilly water. In the meadows, the pale purple of the blackberry vines is visible above the snow.

I almost watch for the red-winged blackbirds to light once more in the sugar maples. I know they cannot come until March, but I watch.

This season, I think, is like some people I know. Under the austere surface beats the warm strong heart. Some people are summer people, and they are easy to know. But they also are casual as summer. February people are deep and true, once you penetrate to the secret warmth. For the yeast of growing things is in the air, even while we shovel the snow and thaw the water bucket.

Country people go into February with a proud sense of having weathered so much of winter. A few more weeks, they say. Six weeks, seven weeks, no matter.

"I'm trying a new hybrid corn this time," says one.

"I plan to plow the upper field early," says another. "Put it into alfalfa for a change."

I remember when I was growing up in Wisconsin how endless winter seemed. Father put up with it during December, and controlled himself during January, but by February he was through.

And almost the only thing father could not control was the climate. He would stamp in, covered with snow, and fiercely accuse mamma of doing something wrong. Her cooking was flawless, but he found something to object to. The house was too hot. Or the house was too cold. Why didn't she watch the furnace when he was at college?

And why wasn't I at home studying my Latin instead of going off in all this cold to some high-school affair? And he didn't like that boy anyway.

Mamma would say serenely, "Rufus, winter won't last forever. It never does."

But father was not a patient man. He took bad weather as a personal insult. I have never known anyone else who felt a drop to thirty below was especially aimed at him.

In those days, cars were delicate. Ours was always refusing to start on bleak February mornings. Father would be due at an eight-o'clock, and he would snatch a kettle of boiling water from the gas stove and fling it on the engine.

"That will show her," he said.

If the car still refused to start, he took off for his class at a dead run, hampered by his fur-lined coat, which he never buttoned. That meant he sailed against the wind, for the coat flaps billowed out.

Father was New England born and bred, but it wasn't in him to be a typical anything. I often think of him when I go to the store on a bleak February day and see the villagers comfortably filling their carriages with vegetables and grapefruit.

We are so calm, I think with surprise as one farmer says, "Yup, pump froze last night."

And another says, "Milk almost froze before I got through milking."

Now that the lettuce is the pale store variety, we like to make Gretchen Maring's 2-4-6 salad. It is easy and good.

It calls for 2 onions, 4 dill pickles, 6 crisp eating apples. These are cut into

MOTHER TAKES OVER THE CLASS ... Plainedge, New York

SETH MIDDLETON

While teacher is away, Mrs. Peggy O'Sullivan, mother of five, steps in to help third-graders with arithmetic problems. The parent-substitute plan has enabled Long Island schools to work more efficiently.

Parents as Teachers

By MARGARET HICKEY

More than 11,000 housewives (plus a few husbands) on more than 100 college campuses have gone back to school to prepare for a career in teaching. Especially geared to train mature graduates in a minimum period of time, these college programs are helping provide a few of the 750,000 new teachers needed in the nation's classrooms during the next three years. That is the report from Mrs. Alice Leopold, assistant to the Secretary of Labor for women's affairs, and one of the chief supporters of the new, concentrated courses.

Many of the new parent-teachers are being recruited by citizen groups. In Kansas, for example, when in 1951 and 1952 the state Department of Instruction and other education groups organized a series of 28 recruitment meetings throughout the state, local P.T.A.'s rounded up scores of parents to attend. At each meeting, recruitment teams signed up applicants who could qualify for a standard certificate by September, 1952. About 400 new teachers were added to Kansas classrooms.

The American Association of University Women is another organization active in teacher recruitment. In Wilmington, Delaware, last year the unit's education chairman recruited herself, along with 24 other housewives, to take the University of Delaware's special refresher course. And in Pendleton, Oregon, A.A.U.W. education committee members conferred with the city school superintendent, the assistant state superintendent and the president of nearby Eastern Oregon College of Education about the teacher shortage. The outcome was that the state Department of Education organized a two-term course of study to prepare 20 men and women (with bachelor degrees) for emergency teaching certificates, good for five years. In Whittier, California, the A.A.U.W. education committee canvassed the entire membership by telephone, and reports that seven women are now working toward teaching credentials.

In Prince Georges County, Maryland, school principals scoured their neighborhoods for parents who had trained for teaching or who held college degrees. After careful screening, they invited the best qualified to take a short, concentrated refresher course to become substitute or emergency teachers. Over the past six years, this program has added more than 110 new teachers to the county rolls. END

The phone rang. It was only 7 A.M., but Peggy O'Sullivan moved fast. As soon as she hung up she dashed to turn off the washer, put the laundry back in the hamper, breakfasted the five small O'Sullivans, aged 9, 8, 6, 4 and 2, and deposited Margaret and Eileen, the youngest, with a neighbor.

A few minutes after 8 o'clock she was telling a roomful of Plainedge, Long Island, third-graders, "Your regular teacher, Miss Myers, is away, but I will take her place. We will do the work she planned for you, and if we finish in time perhaps we can play a game."

Six months ago the same class had been bedlam without a substitute teacher. Youngsters ran up and down aisles and balanced precariously on window sills. Erasers flew. A little girl, sash dragging, screamed as she was pushed off a bookcase. A boy who had retired shyly behind a book was on the point of tears from his classmates' teasing. A half hour after classwork was to have started the school nurse restored order and marched the children off to a room which they shared with fourth-graders for the rest of the day.

Today the basic situation was the same, but there was no rioting as Peggy O'Sullivan smoothly took over, thoroughly familiar with classroom routine, one of several dozen enthusiastic young parents who have become an accepted part of the Plainedge district school system.

Only Lonnie Gertz indicated anything was different from an ordinary day. He raised his hand. "Mrs. O'Sullivan, did you teach my brother's class in fifth grade last week?"

Peggy consulted the seating chart. "Why, yes, Lonnie, I did."

Lonnie grinned and whispered, "She's swell—throws just like my dad."

A year ago Plainedge had only 6 regularly qualified substitutes for 197 full-time teachers, and when more than 6 "regulars" were out classes had to be thrown together on an emergency basis. Rooms had to be rearranged, work plans disrupted, busy principals took over classwork—even school-office personnel were called in to keep order. Sometimes this happened several times a month, since each teacher is allowed 14 days' leave during the school year for illness, personal or business reasons. More time was lost when teachers returned and had to make up work missed.

Children brought home lively (and, to their parents, troubling) reports of upsets and disorder. Moreover, most classes were on split shifts, and overcrowded. School property taxes had quadrupled since 1950.

Most parents realized that there were enormous problems in a school district that had materialized from a desolate flatland of potato farms to a bustling commuters' community in five years—still, they wondered, "With the high taxes we pay, shouldn't our children be getting better-run schools?"

It was in a wary spirit of "What are they up to now?" as much as helpful interest that they reacted to a notice sent home with every school child in the district:

Are you interested in substitute teaching? If you are—and if you have a college degree or comparable training—please contact your school principal. A meeting will be called.

Almost 100 turned out, including Peggy O'Sullivan, who had received the notice in triplicate from Elizabeth, Robert and Maureen. The first thing they got was a picture of why the schools were in trouble.

Taxes are high, they were told, because four new elementary schools and a junior high had to be built in five years. School enrollment had increased more than 2500 per cent—with the peak not expected for several years. Before they were through, elementary-school facilities would have to be expanded still more, additional teachers hired and a new senior high built.

Plainedge could count itself lucky that it had no shortage of full-time teachers, who are easily attracted to a new, still-formative school system. But substitute teachers were another story in this community made up almost exclusively of young parents tied to home and jobs. And yet, if substitutes could not be found the whole school program would have to be revised drastically. What about it—could the parents help?

Peggy O'Sullivan considered. As a Hunter College graduate, she had taught in Croton, New York, schools for two years while husband Tom was overseas. After Tom came back and a year's time out to have Elizabeth she had taught for two more years in physical education at Hunter while Tom finished school. When Robert came along she had retired (if five babies is retirement!), but she had always thought she would like to go back to teaching sometime when the children were older. Perhaps if she could arrange for their care she could go back now on a part-time basis.

Many who came to the meeting had no teaching experience. Shirley Kass had been a chemistry major, Sylvia Gertz studied law at New York University. Frances Weinstein worked as a field representative for the Bureau of Labor Statistics after her graduation from Ohio State. But they had been den mothers, camp counselors, playground supervisors, Sunday-school teachers—working with children in groups not unlike school.

The only man there was blond, tanned George Jacobsen, a pilot for Pan American Airlines who had just got back from the New York-San Juan, Puerto Rico, run. He and pretty Alice Jacobsen had worried about teaching methods as they saw them through 10-year-old George, Jr. They wanted to know, should so much time be spent on drill books—is there enough homework? Are children being taught to think? The opening fact-sheet statement answered some of their questions. Now as George listened further he thought: a pilot's schedule often leaves him with several days' free time during the week. If he could, wouldn't it be a good idea to help out with this program?

There was still the problem—how to take care of the children while the parents were in school. A lucky few had sitters they could call on. Others paired off in a co-operative you-sit-for-me-and-I'll-return-the-favor arrangement. Some who could not qualify themselves offered to baby-sit for others. Margaret McMorrow's husband, Joe, a New York City policeman who works nights, said he could watch the children whenever Margaret was needed at school.

They were warned against any notion that substitute teaching is easy—in some ways it is more difficult than regular teaching, especially in discipline. A teacher who will be around only one day is regarded as fair game by lively youngsters.

But applications continued to come in—more than 200, which to supervising principal Charles Johnson meant that "people were not just out to criticize us but wanting to get in on our side."

Opposition came from teachers and regular substitutes incensed at the idea of letting in "outsiders" without academic degrees in education. They said it would dangerously lower teaching standards; one called it "dragging people in off the streets."

School-board president Tilford Gaines took a firm stand in favor of "the first fresh idea we've had"; but the board's vice-president, Edward Miller, Sr., was "dismayed" that they might be "just high-priced baby sitters."

Parents worried that "people in the community" would see reading charts and I.Q. records. "But shouldn't teachers be 'people in the community'?" asked Peggy O'Sullivan. "Shouldn't we be able to trust them the way we would a doctor or a lawyer?"

School officials explained that parents were sought not as an improvement over present teachers but as emergency help without which they could hardly carry on. They would not see confidential records or teach their own children. Regular substitutes would get first call on jobs. Candidates would be rigorously screened and take a year's school-methods course under principal Rita Duffy before any classroom work. After these explanations, hostility simmered down and classes began every Thursday night for adults, including several men who follow George Jacobsen's lead.

They learned how to present courses, ke order, carry out routine work and handle t occasionally difficult situation of meeti visiting parents to discuss problems. (M Duffy recalls startled faces: "They thoug it was a parents' problem!")

Six weeks later a cold rain sent muddy t rents down some of the district's still-unpav streets. More than a dozen teachers te phoned to say they were down with the f A number of others were attending a meeti in a neighboring district or were off on "vi tations" to observe other schools. Tho teachers who reported braced themselves f a day when classes would have to double and school offices be emptied while perso nel from superintendents on down took ov classroom duty—unless something were do Something, specifically, which was not sche uled to happen for months yet: the teach parent substitute program.

Mrs. Duffy watched classrooms filling and thought of her Thursday parents, eag bright, with a quick sensitivity for teachi problems and techniques. It was "the w you'd feel with a railroad ticket in yo pocket and having to stand in the stati while your train pulled out." She got on t phone with Doctor Johnson, who called d trict superintendent John Chisholm. Th decided to send in some parents on a t basis.

What is the best time for toilet training?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DR. SPOCK.

"Even if your baby has seemed to be well trained for several months, don't be surprised if he suddenly seems to forget what it's all about. This kind of resistance is very common. I don't think babies forget that easily; they just get wiser and more independent."

ABBOT MILLS

"Generally speaking, babies themselves gradually gain control as they grow. The most that parents can do is guide them a little."

I want to discuss again the topic of bowel training, which I last tackled two years ago. In order to make clearer some of the attitudes that have been expressed in recent years, I think it's helpful to take a historical view.

In the first part of this century there was a lot of enthusiasm on the part of doctors and parents for early and vigorous training. The germ theory of disease had been developed in the last part of the nineteenth century and everybody was very conscious of bacteria.

It was known that the intestinal tract is "alive" with bacteria which play a part in the processes of fermentation, putrefaction and digestion. It was natural that doctors should consider the possibility of "autointoxication" from the absorption of materials from such an unpleasant part of the body. One scientist developed the theory that life could be greatly prolonged for all human beings if they would regularly consume acidophilus bacilli to supplant the putrefactive bacteria already living in their intestines. Many doctors believed that the first step in treating an infectious disease was to clean out the intestines. I, like most children then, was given castor oil routinely at such times. One of our professors in medical school taught us in the late 1920's that the main reason why a child would fall ill with a disease like tonsillitis or a cold was that he had been too hurried after breakfast that morning to have his bowel movement. The professor advised us to teach parents to say to their children, "No stool, no school."

As more experience was gained in testing these theories, it was gradually realized that the kind of bacteria living in the intestines and the regularity of the bowel movements don't have this much importance in health or disease. But I think you can see why in the early part of this century there was so much enthusiasm for early rigorous toilet training. It was naturally assumed that if regularity of the movement was the cornerstone of health, then the earlier a baby was trained to move his bowels on the potty right after breakfast, the better.

Meanwhile Freud and his followers, from their studies of certain patients, were realizing that if a parent had put severe pressure on a baby or small child in bowel training, confining him on the pot for long periods against his wishes, shaming him deeply for accidents, it might warp his outlook on life, making him either excessively balky or else worrisome, overly meticulous and much too preoccupied with his bowels.

Pediatricians like myself who saw all the overemphasis on training in the 1920's and 1930's and who had learned about the possible dangers, from psychoanalysts, were groping for the right kind of advice to give parents. In my first few years of practice I emphasized, of course, the importance of the baby's co-operation and the mother's agreeableness. Having little else to go by, I suggested one year as a reasonable age to start. But after a few years of experience, I became somewhat disillusioned about the perfection of this line of advice. To be sure, it worked well for a majority of parents. But there were some who ran smack into trouble in that fourteen-to-eighteen-month period when so many children suddenly become possessive about their movements, refusing any longer to have them when and where their mothers wish, but preferring to let them go anywhere else.

Meanwhile we pediatricians were hearing the following story occasionally, from a mother who was consulting us for the first time. She would say, "With my first two children I knocked myself out trying to train them. I started early, stuck with it, ran into strong rebellion and angry feelings on both sides. I ended up with children who weren't finally trained till three years or so. With my third I was too tired and discouraged to get started. Then to my amazement at about two years of age he suddenly decided he wanted to use the toilet like his older brothers. He proudly trained himself for bowels and urine within twenty-four hours and has been no trouble since." Then she might add, "Why don't you doctors tell us that it can be that easy?"

That sounded good, to us who were interested in this problem, and for several years I recommended that mothers wait for their children to practically train themselves through signals or imitation.

But again time proved that this was not a universal solution. It worked well for a majority of the mothers who were willing to wait until somewhere near two years of age. But there were still a few who ran into trouble: an occasional child would show no inclination to give signals or to imitate his older brother's trips to the toilet. Sometimes if the mother began putting him on the seat at two he might balk right away. If she became impatient, it would only make him more resistant.

I realized that there are some children who are unusually sensitive to training efforts, easily becoming balky or alarmed in the second year almost as if they thought the mother was trying to take away a part of their body. I also realized that in our kind of civilization, which for so long has expected children to be trained early, it's unfair to expect some mothers to be able to wait agreeably for two years. It seemed, in some of the cases which failed, that the kind of strict training that the mother herself had had as a small child was probably the thing that was making her impatient, despite her efforts to be casual, and that this crossness was getting through to her child and making him resistant or fearful.

When I wrote my book I tried to take into account the more casual parents and the more concerned ones. I said that many children will become grown up enough in the second year to signal or to imitate, with only a little encouragement from the parent. But I suggested that if the parents were not inclined to wait that long they might well start getting the baby accustomed to using the seat in the latter part of the first year—if his movements were regular—well in advance of the balky age.

The JOURNAL article two years ago was written in response to letters from a number of distressed or disgusted mothers who had started training efforts at various age periods and had got nowhere. I quoted from several letters to show how strongly many parents feel, and said that some who think ahead of time that they don't care find out that they care a lot.

In the two years since then I have talked with some more parents who have had no success either with training efforts or with waiting for self-training. I have talked with child psychiatrists who have dealt with many training problems. I have talked to and corresponded with pediatricians who are interested in this question. And I've come to the conclusion that my previous advice was somewhat

BRINGING UP BABY®

ONVERSATION PIECE

A day for justifiable pride — the day when baby's first real word tumbles from that rosebud mouth. The day your toddler turns talker is a good time for you to turn teacher. A few ways to guide your orator-in-the-making:

1. At first baby will learn by imitation, with little idea of word meaning. It helps to talk directly to him and repeat often.
2. Pointing to objects as you talk teaches baby word meanings by association.
3. When you give commands it's helpful to use the same words each time to avoid confusion.
4. By speaking slowly and enunciating clearly you help baby to perfect his pronunciation.

HE WHYS OF VARIETY IN TODDLER MENUS

Toddlers are live wires and need lots of energy and strength to keep up with their great activity and growth. A variety of foods is needed at this stage because no one food does a complete job. This combination of different foods provides the various nutritional factors babies require. Gerber offers over 30 Junior Foods in 5 classifications: fruits, vegetables, meats, soups, desserts — prepared with an evenly minced texture for tots who can chew.

NOTHER NUTRITION NOTATION

At the beck and call of a toddler's appetite — delicious main dishes with very nutritious leanings. Gerber Junior Soups combine 3 important food groups for unusual flavor interest and a variety of wholesome food values — meat and cereal proteins, vitamins and minerals. 5 appetizing Vegetable and Meat Combinations—4 Junior Dinners. Newest Gerber goodies on your grocer's shelves:

SPLIT PEAS WITH HAM
CHICKEN NOODLE DINNER
BEEF & NOODLES WITH VEGETABLES
MACARONI, TOMATO, BEEF & BACON

OST-NOTHING HAPPINESS

Cost-nothing, do-something surprises for toddlers who are getting more skillful with their hands: (1) An old purse or wallet for the important business of taking out and putting back treasures. (2) A pair of baby's outgrown shoes for learning the art of lacing. (3) Or at small cost, a nest of plastic blocks for eye and hand coordination.

ATISFACTION GUARANTEED

Nothing quite so satisfying to an active, growing toddler as that daily serving of meat. Gerber Junior Meats are especially satisfying and rich in the complete proteins so necessary for strength, growth and the development of all body structures. Like Gerber Strained Meats, they're made from selected, savory Armour cuts, carefully processed to remove most of the fat and coarse tissue. The texture is evenly minced and just right for tots who can chew. Your choice of 5 tempting varieties . . . all pure meat with just enough broth to bring out the natural true-meat flavors. If baby is still a lap-sitter you'll find the 8 Gerber Strained Meats ideal . . . delicate in flavor . . . velvet-smooth in consistency.

UB-A-DUB DOUBLED

If your toddler likes to linger in the big tub, you might combine business with the pleasure of watching the splasher by using this time to rinse out a few hand-washables in the basin. Or what better time to indulge yourself in a facial—do a stint of hair-brushing—or give yourself a manicure.

one-sided and that it occasionally led parents astray.

In writing my book I was so concerned with the balkiness of the second year and with the ill effects of a training battle that I gave too much emphasis, I think, to the negative aspects. I started the chapter with warnings and I ended up with the overly definite sentence: "Practically all the children who regularly go on soiling after two are those whose mothers have made a big issue about it and those who have become frightened by painful movements." I was trying so hard to keep the scrappy parents from doing battle that I probably worried and inhibited two other kinds of parents: those who because of their upbringing would be somewhat tense about training anyway, and those who lack confidence in their own judgment and conscientiously follow the advice of a supposed expert to the letter. They may have been so impressed by the warnings that they leaned over backward to keep from ever showing the child in the first place what they would like him to do. Or if they had started training and run into resistance, they felt that they must make no further reference to it at all.

I have learned from child psychiatrists who have worked with many cases of resistance the importance of continued positive suggestions to the child. Each day when he soils, the mother can say, "Tomorrow you can tell me when you need to go and you can sit on the seat the way other big boys and girls do. Then you won't have to get dirty and uncomfortable and I won't have to clean you up," or words to that effect.

There is no doubt that women have more courage than men. It takes courage just to be a woman.

WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

This gives her the opportunity she needs to do something and it reminds the child that training is an achievement about which he and his mother will someday be proud.

You may be interested to hear of the experience of some other pediatricians especially interested in toilet training who have written to me. They find that a good number of parents start training—and make a success of it—at each of the three main age periods: 6–12 months ("catching"); 12–18 months (the child becoming more aware but the parent taking the responsibility); 18–24 months (when a majority of children give signals, but some have to be given the idea). Few parents wait for imitation toward the very end of the second year. These doctors say that in their experience quite a few mothers who start putting the child on the seat before twelve months soon give up because he is not regular enough to catch consistently.

The doctors agree that a proportion of the babies who have previously been accustomed to the seat go through a period of rebellion, but some doctors find that proportion is as small as 10 per cent and others put it as high as 50 per cent. They believe that a great majority of the rebels can be eased back into using the toilet, sooner or later, by a combination of patience and encouragement.

To sum it up, they agree that training can be accomplished successfully at various ages, but that temporary difficulties may arise in any period.

I think that there are two things which are most important for parents to keep in mind. The first is that a child does have feelings about his bowels, which change at successive ages. Before a year he takes little interest. His bowels move because they are full or because they have been "conditioned" to the feel of the toilet seat. He is not consciously co-operative.

In the first part of the second year he becomes gradually aware of himself, his bodily

WORK

WHY REPEAT MISTAKES?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

In one of every five marriages taking place today, the bride or groom or both have been married before. The same factors that determine the success or failure of first marriage—the emotional maturity of the couple, their suitability as mates for each other, and their preparation for the responsibilities of marriage—will largely determine the degree of happiness that previously married individuals find in remarriage.

But if the first marriage was unhappy, remarriage poses special problems. Unfortunately, people don't always learn from experience. The faulty attitudes and character traits, whatever they were, that contributed to the first failure may not have been corrected; indeed, they are very often aggravated and intensified. The individual's whole personality may be weakened by the bitterness and hostility arising from the divorce and settlement. That is the principal reason why the breakup rate of second marriages is at least 50 per cent greater than that of first marriages.

It is unsound for the once unhappily married individual to assume, as many do, that his second marriage stands a better chance of success than his first, simply because of his experience. Unless he (or she) has genuinely learned from previous mistakes, the reverse is true. If he has learned, he will take time to be sure—sure that he is now truly ready for marriage, and that he has found a suitable mate. These remarks were brought to mind by the story of a young man who recently appealed to me for help.

Tony introduced himself by a telephone call from Chicago. He was driving from the Coast to visit his parents in the East, and wanted to stop to consult me about a decision confronting him. He felt an outsider's viewpoint would be more helpful than that of family or friends.

Tony proved to be a personable fellow of thirty-four, a sales executive for a West Coast firm. He'd interrupted college to serve in the Army, then returned to finish. Right after graduation he married a girl he'd met in classes, "very attractive, and popular with the boys." His wife went to work in an advertising firm while he got on his feet. Her work was interesting, well paid, and she didn't mind the long hours. Often she stayed downtown for dinner, and gradually started drinking and going out with the men she met in business.

Finally she drifted into at least one affair, to Tony's certain knowledge, and he suspects there were others. Finally, three years ago, they agreed to call it quits and were divorced. She remarried, and has been divorced again. Tony has now lost track of her.

"After that I wasn't interested in women, or marriage, and I settled down to work and save my money. Then, about a year ago, at a party with some business friends, I met a woman I liked. She was four years older than I, but lively, good company and easygoing. I enjoyed myself more than I had for a long time. The next few months I took her out casually maybe once or twice a week, usually winding up at a bar or cocktail party. She's good fun in a crowd, and I liked having her along when I entertained customers. Our friends started asking us places together, and the next thing I knew she seemed to think we were engaged.

"I still like to be with her, and I'm fond of her. Maybe I love her. She's been married before, too, and has a daughter fourteen and a son sixteen, but their father supports them and they take care of themselves when they're not in school.

"I don't suppose I want to live alone the rest of my life, and maybe this is the time to get married. But I'm pretty confused and I thought I ought to get an outsider's opinion before going ahead."

As we talked, other facts emerged. This woman leads a life of complete idleness or pleasure seeking, since her alimony (which will be reduced if she remarries) provides for a servant. She drinks regularly, seldom to intoxication, but often to indiscretion, and her behavior in public when she is "high" has several times embarrassed Tony. At parties, she is inclined to flirt with other men, which also humiliates him. However, he thinks she will stop flirting, and control her drinking, when and if they marry.

With the aid of our marriage tests, we helped Tony to recognize his needs and wants in marriage, and to assess his own assets and liabilities. He needs a wife who is stable, affectionate, more interested in him and their home than in party-going, who is accustomed to and will provide for him a tranquil, well-regulated life. As he visualized in positive terms the kind of woman he does need, he soon saw without suggestion on my part that he had not yet found her, and that he needed a greater measure of stability himself before undertaking another marriage. Too, he realized that the woman he was considering as his second wife displayed many of the traits which had distressed him in his first. (Unfortunately, this tendency to repeat is a common phenomenon.)

Tony decided then and there not to go ahead with the marriage, or to risk drifting along in the present nebulous relationship. Instead, he will remain in the East and find another job. As this is written, he has telephoned his fiancée of his decision, explaining that he felt they both had personal problems which should be solved before they considered marriage.

Naturally, she was aggrieved and resentful, and her reproaches were not easy for Tony to accept. But he stood firm, and I believe that she as well as he will be better off for his action in the long run. Perhaps this disappointment will provide the incentive she needs to try to make herself a better prospect as a wife for some other man, if not for Tony.

For—though I have never talked to her—it is almost certain that Tony is little better qualified to be her husband than she is to be his wife. The simple truth is that neither is ready for remarriage, and neither has found the right mate.

Here are some questions that may help the man or woman who has endured an unhappy marriage to evaluate the prospects of happiness in a second marriage. You will observe that they concern the individual's own qualifications, as well as those of the possible mate.

Do you question its wisdom? Whatever the reason (and it may be based as much upon hunch or feeling as upon tangible facts), if you aren't sure that the marriage is a wise venture, resolve your doubts before going ahead.

Is your previous marriage "finished"? It is just as important that you no longer be bitter toward your former mate as it is that the love you once felt be completely gone. Until the scars of the past have healed and been adjusted to, you are not ready to marry again.

Are you a better marriage risk now? Undoubtedly you made mistakes in your first marriage, and were partly responsible for its failure. Unless you accept this fact, recognize how and where you fell down, and now know ways to prevent reoccurrence, your remarriage is not going to succeed.

Is the mate a good risk? If he or she has been divorced, then his or her limitations must be examined in respect to the two previous questions. Again, unless the answers are favorable, it simply means that the mistakes of the past will be repeated.

Are there related problems? Included in such problems are any financial obligations to a previous marriage, future relationships to any children involved, social adjustment if you two live in the same community where a previous spouse resides, in-law resistance, friends' attitudes, and so on. The time to resolve issues of this kind is before, not after remarriage.

Are you two well matched? Do you share many interests in common, similar standards, values and goals in life? Do you come from similar backgrounds in respect to religion, education and social position? Are you attracted to the same people? Differences in matters like these, important as they are in the first marriage, are likely to be even more critical in a second marriage.

There is no valid reason for marriage unless you believe in it as the happiest, most productive and most rewarding way of life. If you believe in marriage, you want yours to succeed. Think of the marriage you are contemplating as your only future marriage, whether it be your first or second. And take time to be sure that you two can make this marriage work.

ASK YOURSELF:

What Faults Has My Husband?

No husband is perfect, neither is any wife. In the list below, check only those faults that you feel have adversely affected your love for your husband or the satisfaction of your marriage.

Does Your Husband:

1. Smoke excessively?
2. Use extreme, unforgivable profanity?
3. Gamble, or take serious financial risks?
4. Blame you for everything that goes wrong?
5. Try to prevent you from having friends?
6. Keep you upset and uneasy much of the time?
7. Have an ungovernable temper?
8. Ridicule your standards and ideals?
9. Lack acceptable table manners?
10. Belittle you in public?
11. Compare you unfavorably with other wives?
12. Spend too much money on himself?
13. Have crude or vulgar habits?
14. Treat you rudely and disrespectfully?

About a fourth of wives complain of three or more of these faults, half report one or two, and the remaining fourth none. Needless to say, those who mention none or at most one are happiest in marriage. Items one through seven usually reflect traits present before marriage, but the others may express his rebellion against some aspect of his relationship with his wife. If he appears jealous or lacking in self-confidence, more affection and attention to his needs may bring positive results. With three or more checks, professional counsel is probably needed.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"It would help me so much, Harry, if you just wouldn't help me so much."

Why do the women seem to mature more gracefully than the men? Every time we go back to the state university our feminine classmates are more modish, the men a little seedier. (Maybe the girls care more?)

We're expecting Junior home on overseas furlough before he flies to Japan, a navigator-bombardier with new wings. I won't even ask him to shovel snow or rake leaves. (But I'll bet he helps his mother wash the dishes!)

Maybe it's the 1957 strain, but a 1957 cook gets as fatigued ovening frozen chicken breasts for dinner as her grandma did catching the hen, axing it, cleaning the insides and picking the feathers. (I, too, get tired, changing an electric bulb.)

"How can we remind our children," muses Betty Comfort, making a cooky valentine for an old beau, "that we're only twenty-five years older than they are, and never lived in medieval times?"

I never expected to see the day when middle-aged people delayed their annual trip to Florida to see a local high-school basketball game, or hurried home not to miss the state basketball tournament.

I sympathize with the middle child of a neighbor, a boy who had an adorable older sister to cope with, then collided with a wee enchanting baby sister who monopolized most of pa's and mom's affection. No wonder he became a stubborn individualist at fifteen.

My intuitive wife urges me to send a nice valentine to any of my old flames who might still remember me, but nothing more sentimental than a two-pound box of candy.

At the bridge table our wives agree that a man can have ten to twenty serious faults and still be a wonderful husband if he's considerate.

I'm peddling among our friends the new French idea that if you're neurotic your handwriting gets worse, and if you improve your handwriting you begin to cure your neuroses. This theory I urge ardently on people who write letters in longhand.

At our cafeteria round table downtown we argued at lunch whether Lincoln or Washington would have dominated a dinner for eight. Most of us chose Lincoln; G. W. seems to have been the type who couldn't remember a funny story.

My neighbor the learned lawyer is reluctantly discarding his illusion that by lecturing his son he can save him from pitfalls. "I'm shocked to discover," he says, "how much my boy loves his pitfalls."

One of the more docile husbands in our block thinks the American Legion or VFW could quadruple their membership and maybe double their weekly attendance if they'd emphasize an ex-warrior's right to one night out a week.

A lady expert from Boston told our town's teachers they ought to bear down harder on their pupils and instill some discipline. As nearly as I can discern, the teachers did a double take as if to say "Who, me?" Referred to the next P.T.A. meeting.

A few of our town's barbers shave you with a safety razor or an electric, if you're bold enough to ask for a shave. Some of 'em decline to shave anybody, except maybe some celebrity whose blemishes they'd like to study.

Our beloved young ones study English with pain, as if it were a foreign language. But they bring a natural and eager talent to their corridor courses in Beginning Scorn and Advanced Sarcasm.

Our town's deeper thinkers wonder if we shouldn't show one another more candidly our affection. Our young matrons hug a book called Love or Perish; so the cousinly kiss of hello, the pat on the cheek, the caress of the lapel grow fashionable again.

Maybe our well-to-do are a little more brazen than they were. Our neighbors who used to apologize for going south in the wintertime now apologize if they don't go.

Among us parents in our town it's an open secret that we all love teenagers, even envy 'em. Our problem: How can we reveal this without letting 'em put a ring through our noses?

Don't tell us the reason for Elvis Presley, let us guess: Youth is in revolt, and Elvis is its symbol. But may we whisper that you can't wear Lincolns and Cadillacs like roller skates merely by wriggling and pouting and wearing long sideburns unless you play a guitar?

A few determined men in our town have vowed to look admiringly each day at two or three homely girls on the main street, to improve local morale. (At pretty girls, just deadpan?) Wives can't frown on this!

A girl in our town, a slim lovely blonde who bakes the best homemade bread in the state, plunged into politics up to her lovely neck last fall. I hope she's begun to bake homemade bread again.

I have grave doubts that any woman will ever be elected President of these United States so long as any woman is ever seen wearing toeless or heelless shoes in slushy weather.

Alas, the soda fountain vanishes from more of our drugstores, driven out by the two-hour Coke and the druggist's ambition to own a bazaar. Now you see the aging cherry-phosphate drinkers of yore wangling a penicillin pill or a swig of cough sirup.

I'd just told the girl on my right at a dinner that a room without a book is a cave, when the girl on my left said their neighbor in Moonlit Acres was strange, he keeps reading books. "Antisocial!" she describes him.

I'm inspired to congratulate my Dream Girl on the improved quality of the leftovers I find in the refrigerator at midnight. But I don't kid myself; it's due to pressure from our young, not mine; and I dasn't look at the grocery bill.

I'm a low fellow: after the last "fun night" at my son's school I concluded our town's P.T.A. spark plugs yearn to feed people good cookies and meat loaf, above their passion for pupils who'll read good books.

. . . When I find myself bragging about my son-in-law's brains,

. . . Or our youngest, enchanted by a guest who's a Pulitzer-prize winner, writes his semester literature essay about him,

. . . And Junior seems destined to be flying over the China Sea when his bride brings their six-week-old cherub across the Pacific,

. . . Or my Lady Love, after two lessons in handwriting analysis, discovers a certain secretiveness in my script,

Then I wonder why timid souls ever fear marriage may be dull.

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

Pinafores, jumpers, saucy bolero jackets and pancake sailors heaped with plumage, roses and ribbons were the rage in February, 1907. The first tenor lifted his voice to The Road to Mandalay; School Days was written; and the first quick-lunch counters appeared in America.

"Electric bulbs cost seven times as much to use as incandescent gas," relates the February, 1907, JOURNAL in an article on lighting the home.

"In answer to mothers who ask what to do for their daughters, I say let them alone," maintains A Plain Country Woman. "Some of the most miserable women I have known were those who as girls were held superior to their environments."

"How a Mother of Five Regulates Her Day: Baby brother is nursed at 6 a.m., 8 a.m., 10 a.m., bottle feeding at noon. Nursed at 2 p.m., 4 p.m., 6 p.m., 8 p.m., 10 p.m., and 2 a.m."

Dating after business hours: "On Tuesday nights I read a good novel with one of my men friends," writes a business girl. "I generally do my week's mending while he reads. Sometimes we sing duets."

"Make your wash dresses early in the season except for the sleeves, which can be added later when the new style books appear," advises Mrs. Rorer.

Beauty: "A bran bag is put into the bath and thoroughly soaked and squeezed until the water is brown and full of bubbles. This has a very softening effect upon the skin and is known in Sweden as the Bride Bath."

"What gift can a young woman give a man?" a reader wants to know. "Something of her own handiwork, provided it is worth having, which I might add, in the young man's interest, is rarely the case," answers Mrs. Kingsland.

"Heat your clothespins in the oven to keep your fingers comfortable on a cold winter's day."

"Girl Student Life in Paris: Evil is less disguised in Paris. The student must guard herself with care. She must be the same honest, pure-minded, faithful, reverent girl in Paris that she is in her American home."

"Veils are a great nuisance to a young baby—they get wet and cold and often chafe the little chin. On windy days (when most mothers put veils on their children) keep baby indoors."

ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know, editors you like, and what goes on in New York

Looking like the gingerbread house in Hansel and Gretel, homes like this are common along the streets in Moscow. Here Mrs. Gould tries one for size.

On her trip behind the Iron Curtain (see page 58) Mrs. Gould was enchanted with the little log houses frequently seen in Moscow, traditional in the villages nearby. Small and low (Mrs. Gould was photographed beside one to give the scale), they are often chocolate brown with a sort of wooden lace (sometimes tin) edging windows and roof lines, the lace in chalk blue or pastel pink—looking for all the world like a fairy-tale house from which three bears or even an ogre might emerge.

As soon as the curtain rang down on The Loud Red Patrick, with David Wayne as a whimsical Irishman, Ruth Imler rushed backstage to see if he was as leprechaunlike in real life as he was in the play, as he was in Finian's Rainbow, or even as he was as Ensign Pulver in Mister Roberts. "Why, I consider myself a fairly serious-minded human being," David declared, to Ruth's disappointment—until he added, "Though I'm always happier in a light gay part. I feel a great exchange of joy with the audience. In fact," he told Ruth, "now you mention it, it works that way offstage too."

Richard Pratt* was telling Margaret Hickey about the evening at dinner on the Twentieth Century Limited out of Chicago some years ago when he introduced Henry Kaiser to Mortimer Adler, who was then professor of philosophy at the University of Chicago, and how Mr. K. had immediately popped a real Kaiser question. "Tell me, professor," he asked, "just what is philosophy?" Seems that before the fascinating answer came to an end the three men were back in the great industrialist's bedroom and the train was pulling into Cleveland. Which reminded Miss Hickey that someone had once asked an even more cosmic question of Ralph Waldo Emerson: "What is civilization?" But in this case the answer was only four words long, and right down our alley. "The power of women," was the great philosopher's reply.

At the Otis Air Force Base on Cape Cod while Joe Di Pietro was photographing this month's How America Lives story, Lt. Col. Daniel (Chappie) James, commanding the 60th Fighter-Interceptor Squadron, and the hero of our story, invited Joe for a ride in his Starfire jet plane—"even though," as Joe remarked, "I've never enjoyed flying." Joe said the only noise inside the plane was the crackle of the radio. They were so high, it was like standing still. "I'll show you how fast we're going," said Chappie, and dived to within fifty feet of the Cape Cod coast line, where he flopped the plane on its side so Joe could see the ground slide underneath them at 600 miles an hour. "Never tell a jet pilot it's like standing still up there," said Joe, still jittery. . . . Chappie is just about the biggest jet pilot in the world—6' 4", 230 pounds. Can't buy a ready-made uniform—has to have them tailored.

and Abbot could return for a story, we said, why, of course. Eventually the two showed up here again at the Workshop. The kangaroo, whose name is Scooter, belongs to Ruth Manecke and Douglas Gruber, Audrey reported, and appears on the Captain Kangaroo television show. "He's molting, so we didn't take his picture. Besides, we liked Bobo better." Bobo is the orangutan who also belongs to Ruth and Doug, who at their place in the country keep all kinds of animals which they rent out to entertainment and advertising people—monkeys, foxes, a horned owl, a crow, a coati, a honey bear, and all sorts of poultry and ordinary pets. "Bobo immediately devoured my eraser," said Audrey, who had obviously found the ape enchanting. "If you scold him he cries, screams and pounds the floor. He sucks his fingers, and if he hasn't got his own little blanket, he won't go to sleep." But what about the kangaroo? we asked. "Oh, he can only jump. I guess he'd leap right across Fifty-second Street if they'd let him."

CONSIDER THE LILIES will soon be published in book form by William Morrow & Co., Inc.

Only one passenger—a girl, tall, pretty and about twenty-five—got off the bus at the halt named Downsview. She stood waiting, looking at the wide, pleasant view and sensing the peace that filled her each time she came from London on a visit.

There was a prolonged hoot heralding the arrival of the station wagon—a long wail of contrition which Kathryn's voice took up as she drew the car to a stop beside her sister. "Carol!" she exclaimed. "I'm terribly sorry! I didn't ——"

"I know, I know," said Caroline. "You said it all to me at Christmas, when you arrived hours late and had to dig me out of the snow." She bent and kissed her. "Hello, Katie."

Kathryn's upturned face showed all her pleasure at the meeting. As pretty a blonde as Caroline was a brunette, her short, fair curls, wide blue eyes and childish figure gave strangers an enchanting impression of youth and innocence, so that her eight years of marriage, stalwart husband and two children came upon them as a succession of severe shocks.

"Look, Carol," she said, "you must be dying for your tea, but I've just got to ——"

"—— tour the village doing this and that. Tell me, and see if I'm surprised," invited Caroline, and put her head in the car window to greet her niece and nephew. "Hello, you two."

"Nice Aunt Carol," said Delfine, who at three years of age had a small but telling vocabulary. "Easter eggs."

"Not so fast," said Caroline. "Easter isn't yet—this is only Tuesday. Hot cross buns on Friday, Easter eggs on Sunday—so patience! Dandy," she went on, addressing her nephew, "what's the fancy dress?"

"I'm a postman," said six-year-old Daniel, with pride.

His aunt withdrew her head and faced her sister accusingly. "What became of the space suit that I gave him for Christmas?" she asked.

Kathryn looked slightly ashamed. "He didn't seem to enjoy space rides. All he wants to be is a postman."

"Then I'll take the space suit back and ask for a refund. Well ——" She lifted her suitcases and, after some rearrangement, found room for them in the car. She climbed in beside her sister. "How's Guy?" she asked.

"He's fine; he sent his love."

"Plenty of sick cows, I trust?"

"Heaps," said Kathryn, with the satisfaction of one whose husband was the only veterinary surgeon in a wide dairy-farming district. "But he's terribly overworked."

"As long as he stops long enough to send out the bills," said Caroline philosophically. "They —— Well, what, Dandy?" she inquired, in response to prods.

"You got any letters for me to d'liver?"

"Not at the moment. I'll write some the minute we get home."

Kathryn stopped at the largest of the three shops. "Here we are. Pass me that list, Carol, will you?"

Caroline passed it. "A whole page long," she remarked. "I only had a scrap breakfast, and I couldn't afford lunch, but don't you hurry on my account; you just take all the time you need."

Kathryn, with a grin that made her small face look like an impertinent schoolboy's, got out of the car; Dandy followed her, and Delfine, an opportunist, directed her aunt's attention to the Easter eggs in the shopwindow.

Kathryn climbed into the car. "Some biscuits for you," she said, handing the packet to Caroline. "Just to take the edge off—but don't spoil your tea. We'll be home in about ten minutes and then ——" She paused. A short, stout, gray-haired woman had hurried out of the shop and was coming toward the car, waving a delaying arm.

"Mrs. Heywood! Mrs. Heywood!"

Kathryn, with a sigh, prepared to listen; the vicar's sister always had a great deal to say, and took a long time to say it. "Hello, Miss Burnley."

Miss Burnley's fat, round face was flushed with exertion. She tried to bring her head close to Kathryn's, but was prevented by the tall feather in her hat; undaunted, she put up a hand and lowered the obstacle, and it came down like the funnel of a steamer about to pass under a bridge. "Oh, Caroline, my dear! I was so full of my own concerns that I didn't notice you were there. Are you down for Easter?"

"She's here for as long as we can make her stay," said Kathryn.

"That's splendid. I like to have you here. Do you know that you and your sister are the only two people in Downsview that I can talk to naturally? It's such a blessed, blessed relief not to have to choose my words! I can't think why God made me a vicar's sister; if He couldn't help it, why couldn't He have created a nice, suitable wife for the vicar? But wait now; Mrs. Heywood, didn't you say in the shop that Dandy was leaving a letter at Crossways House?"

"Yes," said Kathryn. With a glance toward the children, she lowered her voice and spoke appealingly. "But goodness, Miss Burnley, please don't ask me to go in and see Mrs. Lauder. She ——"

"Do you think for a moment that I would if it weren't really important? My dear, I know what a dreadful old woman she is—and you don't know what a relief it is to be able to say so out loud, without any Christian charity! But if you could just go and see her and make an appeal for us. . . . You know what I'm after, don't you?"

"Yes, I do. Lilies." Kathryn's tone was resigned. "Year after year, we ask her; year after year, she refuses. Why should you expect her to have a change of heart after all these years?"

"I don't expect it, but the vicar says that you have to ask her, to give her the chance of doing good. But you know, we do really need the lilies desperately this year; you see, Stokes has always gone round collecting the flowers in previous years, but he's been laid up, as you know. He'll be up tomorrow, but he won't feel like making as wide a circuit as usual. I would have gone round collecting myself, but having him ill meant that we didn't only Bill's great-aunt was old and fragile and helpless. Candy soon realized, however, that she was about as helpless as the Royal Canadian Navy.

"I simply do not understand her," she thought. "Why is she undermining Miss Gabbett? What is she up to, anyway?"

A shattering crash from the kitchen caused Candy's coffee to leap out of its cup. At the other end of the breakfast table, Bill shuddered. From above, Sarah's voice rose in a jungle roar:

"Mummy—mummy! David's got my pinjamas! Make him give me back my pinjamas!"

David's bellowed. "I just want to count her measle spots!"

"They're my measle spots! Stop it, David!"

The telephone screamed.

"Peace, it's wonderful," said Bill feebly.

Candy said through her teeth. "I'm going to tear that thing out by the roots!"

He grinned at her. "You know you love a telephone as much as Alexander Graham Bell."

Candy stuck out her tongue at him as she passed. When she came back, quiet had been restored and Bill was reading a letter.

"Thank goodness the children are out of quarantine today." Candy sighed. "That was Clover Tuckwell. She doesn't sound right at all."

Bill looked up. "Clover? What's the matter with her?"

"Well, really, darling!" Candy expostulated. "A premature baby—a month in the hospital ——"

"If I had a month in the hospital, I'd be a giant refreshed." Bill remarked. "Clover ought to be well by now, oughtn't she?"

Candy shook her head broodingly. "I must get over there as soon as I can."

Bill put down his letter. "Now, look, sweet, just don't take the cares of the world on your shoulders, will you? You've had two cases of measles to look after ——" As Candy pushed back her chair he added quickly, "Have you got a minute?"

"Now, darling?" Candy gazed at him pleadingly.

"Well—I just want to talk to you about this convention in Baltimore next week."

Candy said briskly, "You go right along to Baltimore. I can manage perfectly well without you."

"I don't doubt it—but can I manage without you? You see—well, wives are specially invited and ——"

"Bill, darling, you aren't seriously asking me to go to Baltimore—to a convention—now? With the children—and now Clover ——"

"As for the children," Bill cut in, "this letter is from Great-aunt Harriet Howe. She's—er—she's coming here on Friday."

"Here! On Friday! Great-aunt ——" Candy stopped herself.

Great-aunt Harriet Howe was almost a legendary figure in Bill's family: Bill's family. That was the point. For Bill had always welcomed as a visitor every member of her family, from her mother, whom he adored, all the way down to Cousin Rita, whom nobody adored.

"I'm sorry, sweet," he said unhappily. "This was posted, airmail, from Guatemala City. She's on her way home. But I thought, maybe, since she'd be here to look after things ——"

"Leave a guest as a baby sitter?"

Bill smiled at her. "Aunt Harriet would love it. I used to visit her and Uncle Henry when I was little. She was remarkable. She learned to fence and taught Jake, their cowman, so she could practice every morning before breakfast, in the barn."

"She sounds delightful," Candy said politely. I can just see her, she thought, striding around in a mashed felt hat, roaring about the decadent South and why do you have all this smelly Spanish moss on the trees? Oh dear, oh dear. Families never come singly.

"—— so you see," Bill was saying, "we could leave with perfect safety."

Candy shook her head. "Darling, it's absolutely out of the ——" A renewed uproar from above drowned her words. She raised her eyebrows at him ("You see?") and fled.

The day was a difficult one. The children were in that postconvalescent mood which is guaranteed to turn mothers into chronic invalids; and Luella, the indispensable, had developed an ominously martyred air. Late in the afternoon Candy, powdering her nose hastily at the bathroom mirror, reflected that men were unimaginative, unrealistic ——

Then she eyed her reflection sternly. You're being unfair. You ought to be glad he wants you to go with him. . . . This powder is too dark. . . .

As she ran across Indigo Gate, she clung with determination to her mild gratitude at being wanted, ignoring with equal determination her rather stronger sense of relief at the sheer impossibility of leaving her household in charge of an elderly stranger.

She opened the Tuckwells' front door and announced her presence with the fluting whistle which had become a signal between the two families. Almost at once a pallid, oblong face, crowned with a nurse's cap, peered distrustfully over the banisters. Candy, halfway up the stairs, found herself looking into a pair of small pale eyes like affronted grapes.

"Miss Gabbett?" she asked sunnily. "How do you do? I'm Candace Stewart. Mrs. Tuckwell asked me to drop in this afternoon."

Miss Gabbett drew back, blinking. "Oh. How do you do, I'm sure." She turned and crackled down the hall. Candy followed her. Outside Clover's door, Miss Gabbett turned and eyed Candy. Her upper lip wore six vertical lines, like fine shirring. "We mustn't forget," she murmured, "that we have been through an Ordeal." Then she opened the door.

Clover, tucked up on her chaise longue, looked rather pale, but her gray eyes were shining. She gave a little scream of delight and Candy flew to her. After the first few moments of chatter, Candy asked eagerly, "When am I going to see Thomas?"

Clover said, "Oh, yes, bring Tommy in, Miss Gabbett, will you please?"

Miss Gabbett shirred her lips. Then, majestically, she left the room.

Clover met Candy's eyes. Her fingers pleated the blanket over her knees. She said apologetically, "She just looks sort of—sort of man-eating."

"She looks to me," said Candy thoughtfully, "like a sheep in a paper hat." Then she added hastily, "But I'm sure she's a splendid nurse."

"Oh, she is!" Clover leaned back. The sparkle in her eyes had died. "She doesn't believe in having flowers in your room, or kissing babies much, or more

Here comes Aunt Harriet

The Goulds before Cathedral of St. Basil, adjoining the Kremlin. In exact center of Moscow, the fortresslike Kremlin, architecturally magnificent, groups churches, former palaces, now offices of U.S.S.R.

We saw how Russians Live

"Uniforms are everywhere." Brightly painted domes of St. Basil's illustrate Byzantine past. Cathedral-museum was painted and restored recently.

Just after their return from four weeks in Russia, Bruce and Beatrice Gould shared their experiences with the JOURNAL editorial staff. They were not primarily interested in Kremlin officials, because they felt those officials would express only the current party line. They were interested in people, especially in observing how the people were reacting to the current party line, how the whole regime affects the thoughts and the lives of ordinary citizens. The Goulds were fortunate to have traveling with them a young American graduate student specializing in Russian history, politics and language, who was a free, fluent and colloquial interpreter. With his help they were able to talk with housewives, students, children, taxi drivers, teachers, minor bureaucrats and workers in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Odessa, Simferopol, and the health resort, Sochi, on the Black Sea. Readers are invited to listen in on this informal editorial conference, which was caught by tape recorder and here set down.

MR. GOULD: I'd like to begin by saying how much we owe to our young interpreter. Unless one speaks Russian, or is fortunate enough to find a few students who speak English, the average tourist has no ready access to the thoughts of the ordinary Russian. Cutting him off from all true contact is the party-trained, official Intourist interpreter assigned to show him around.

MRS. GOULD: Often such a guide is the child of long-standing party members, often a Young Communist himself.

MR. GOULD: Your guide not only motors you along the best streets, but he won't let the driver (usually a safe Party man also) take you into the back alleys.

MRS. GOULD: They show you the façade and flatly deny that the other side exists, even though you can see it.

MR. GOULD: Theoretically, things have opened up to the tourist. You hear the phrase constantly (of course only from party members), "This is a free country. You can go anywhere you like." If the people say it, they say it ironically. However—and it's a big however—your Intourist guides are skilled in presenting to you just what they want you to see. If you request a view of anything else, you have to get "special permission." It has to be "arranged." Days of delay follow. The visitor becomes discouraged. So he gets the usual tour: first stop, university; second stop, subway (it's clean, well aired and efficient); third, or sometimes first, mausoleum of Lenin and Stalin in front of the Kremlin, facing Red Square.

MRS. GOULD: People still line up hours and hours in long queues, in bitter cold and wind, to see these two communist leaders.

MR. GOULD: But Intourist cars whisk foreign visitors to the head of the queue at the entrance to the catafalque. It's a very class-conscious society, Russia—more so, I think, than any other European country today except perhaps Spain. If you're a big shot you really rate, with people getting out of your way in a hurry. There are five classes of tourists, from third class up to de luxe. Or as we heard a waiter say, once, trying to hurry our lunch from the kitchen, "You are keeping them waiting and they are tourists of the first category!"

MRS. GOULD: Let me give an example of the way Intourist guides block you from seeing. I was determined to get inside some of the new five-story workers' apartment houses in Moscow and find out how the people actually live. I spent my first four or five days in Moscow tirelessly asking our guides and the officials how to do this. They said, "Oh, we couldn't just go up to somebody's door and knock on it. That would be an intrusion." In Russia it probably would be. If an official Intourist guide knocked on the door, no one would dare refuse.

So I said, "Well, couldn't we go to the door and just explain that I am a foreign visitor who would like to look in because I am interested in how ordinary Russians live? If it is inconvenient now, we will come back another time."

"No," they said, "we couldn't."

"Let's just stop the car and try it once here at this little log house."

"Oh, no. Go on, driver!"

So I asked, "Can I go to a factory where there are women workers and talk to a group? Can I say that I have seen their work and am interested in the women who are doing these difficult things?" (Women do much of the hardest, heaviest work in Russia.) "I want to know how they fit such work in with their homemaking tasks."

"No, no," I was told. It would be impossible to arrange such a thing. I hoped our Intourist guide might take the hint and ask me to her house. She never did.

We finally gave up the official approach and, in Leningrad, tried it our own way. I'll tell you about this later. But our official guides everywhere did their best to prevent us from this simple knowledge—they didn't want us to find out how the ordinary Russian family lives.

SIDE LIGHTS

Some of the most beautiful, old, golden-domed churches in the world are in Russia. Interiors are richly frescoed in jewel tones and gold. A dozen Greek Orthodox churches are kept open in Moscow for the faithful. They are packed every Sunday, mostly by middle-aged or elderly people (who no longer hope for advancement from the regime), or by families baptizing young babies. Anti-religious museums devised to show the faults of organized religion attract few visitors, despite their central location.

★

Bookstores are plentiful and as crowded as subways. People are buying, not just looking. Technical and other informational books are the big sellers.

★

The best food in Russia is caviar. The American tourist usually eats so much of it he never wants to see any again—just as well, since one pays $5.00 here for a portion costing a few rubles in Moscow.

★

Visitors to Russia are not allowed to bring in rubles, which can be bought in New York 8 or 9 for $1.00, in Berlin 12 for $1.00, because the official rate in Russia for the ruble is 4 for $1.00. In the shadow of the Kremlin rubles can be bought on the street for 11 or 12 to the dollar, even cheaper, from young black marketeers.

★

At peasant markets, where farmers can sell for their own profit products raised in their small private gardens, a pomegranate costs five rubles—a peach or an apple, one to two rubles apiece, depending on size and quality. If you figure the 25-cent ruble, that's pretty high. Even at the 10-cent ruble, it's not cheap.

★

Even smaller Russian cities like Kiev, Odessa and Sochi have their own ballet and opera companies. The theaters are handsome, dating usually from czarist days, often done in white and gold and red velvet, with lovely crystal chandeliers. Tickets: $2.00 to $8.50 (at 25-cent rubles). Dancing is technically good, but the conception of ballet—choreography, setting, theme—has remained static since the revolution.

★

Moscow has a magnificent puppet theater, with witty, polished productions. Circuses are popular, usually one ring, with skillful animal and juggling acts and clowns whose comedy is universal.

★

We left Moscow for Prague in Russia's newest civilian jet airliner TU-104. It performed excellently, had attractive, courteous stewardesses, rare on Russian planes. Flight took less than half normal time.

★

Stainless-steel teeth are often used instead of gold in Russia. The idea was imported from Germany, where steel was first used for false teeth. Frequently you see workers, men or women, with whole mouthfuls of stainless-steel teeth.

★

When you see the finest chemical laboratories in the world side by side with 1900 bathroom plumbing; little wrapping paper, or toilet paper, or string, but the latest in jet airliners; dingy, overcrowded apartment houses beside beautifully reconstructed palaces and regilded churches, you realize Russia is a nation of priorities—the government decides what comes first.

Question: Can we get back to your very first impression?

MR. GOULD: My over-all impression of the Russian people is of a group of grim, busy, determined, stolid people, engaged in an enormous enterprise. It is as though in the liquidation of the aristocracy after the revolution most of the people with elegance, grace and charm had disappeared—either dead or fled. Or if they survived, they hid those qualities which would mark them as part of the old regime. And of course prior to the revolution there was hardly a middle class in our American sense, which embraces most of our country. The mass of people, peasants and workers, were so poor, so oppressed they had no opportunity to develop the polish of life. Moreover, many of the powerful leaders, like Stalin, were uncouth and poorly educated. Perhaps to please them, some Russians developed almost consciously bad manners. Also, it's a society under pressure. The only opportunity to live—to have full stomachs—is to fulfill a worker's norm. If they don't do this, they cannot eat. They would have no place to sleep, since the government is the universal landlord. They would have no future. The government controls everything. All these things I myself found it hard to contemplate or to accept, even seeing them with my own eyes.

MRS. GOULD: It is hard to describe the average Russian in terms an American can understand. We're not used to seeing driven people. They know they must obey—of course one sees soldiers everywhere.

MR. GOULD: Driven people tend to lose individual sensitivity. But there is a force about all this that cannot be ignored. Everybody in Russia knows what it means not to do what the government tells you. As people say over there, "Almost every family has had at some time one member taken away to the labor camps in Siberia for not conforming."

MRS. GOULD: Many of those imprisoned people—those who lived—are coming back now. But no one is sure what the "new freedom" means, how far they can trust it, and whether the Terror may return. We know of Russians now refusing to see relatives returning as American tourists, lest they might be persecuted for associating with foreigners if Stalin-like oppression returned.

Question: Do the Russian people seem to have much freedom in their daily lives?

MR. GOULD: They have as much freedom as a good work horse does. A farmer takes care of his work horses. The Russian government does the same. It feeds and takes care of the people enough so they will deliver a maximum amount of work. Beyond that, Russians have little freedom as to jobs, travel or where they will live, and of course no political freedom whatsoever—except Party members who have a minor influence, within carefully restricted limits, on Party leaders.

Nursery-school toddlers, out for airing, are taught to cling to rope held by teacher in front, another behind. Mrs. Gould (left) found this "sensible for safety but touching example of regimentation even for babies."

Question: Mrs. Gould, what was your most vivid impression?

MRS. GOULD: My most vivid impression—the thing that was with me constantly—was this discovery that it is possible to cut off a whole society—200,000,000 people—from news and information about the world outside. I began to be fond of some of the people we talked and worked with. I liked them and I found myself thinking, "You are too intelligent a person to believe all this. The only reason you believe it is that you don't know the truth about the rigid oppression your government practices in the satellites—the mass murder by which they Picks and shovels are women's tools. They excavate, carry heavy loads, build roads as well as keep streets clean (by sweeping). If women pictured have small children, they are in government-supported nurseries.

WOMEN IN RUSSIA

The women carry bricks and mortar, do much of the hardest work. Where roads are being built, you see men leaning against the machines while women shovel the hot, heavy tar. A truck going along the street will be driven by a man. In the back is a woman wearing a quilted cotton coat, lying on sacks of cement or wood or whatever the load is. She has loaded that truck and when it reaches its destination she will unload it.

However, if women are educated they may become doctors, physicists, airplane designers. Around 60 per cent of the doctors in Russia are women.

suppress the rights of the people—while professing lies about a "People's Democracy."

★

Question: Do the Russians realize how little access they have to the facts?

MR. GOULD: The Russians do know, indeed, that they are not getting the whole truth. But they don't know how contrary the truth is to what they have been told.

MRS. GOULD: The blackout on "outside" news is almost complete. Voice of America, Radio Liberation, and BBC news broadcasts are partially or wholly jammed, depending on their subject, and the state of mind of leaders at that moment. Music programs come through. In Moscow we of course could get news from American foreign correspondents, and from our own embassy. The first word we had of the revolt in Poland was a cable received by an N.B.C. correspondent from his New York office. Nothing had been told to the Russian people at all—it was days before the "official" version of the uprising was printed in Pravda.

When we were outside Moscow we had nothing but Pravda. Our young American interpreter read it daily trying to glean something about the rest of the world. Pravda would print in full Shepilov's speech at UN about the Egyptian situation, for instance, but never a word of what anyone said in reply.

MR. GOULD: You have all seen newspaper reports from Moscow in which Khrushchev and Bulganin have said that fascists started the revolution in Hungary. That is all the Russians will hear except by rumor.

MRS. GOULD: In Kiev we asked our Intourist guide if they had magazines there from the United States and England. She said that they did, that they were in the local library. We said we would like to see them. We found that some outside magazines do exist. There was one old issue of Life—I think because it contained a semiscientific article. There were a couple of copies of National Geographic. And there were innumerable up-to-date, carefully filed issues of chemical, physical, scientific and technical publications—in English.

MR. GOULD: But there were no periodicals which deal with contemporary life in America, England or France. There was a complete blackout of newspapers which might give accurate news, or of magazines like the Post or Time or Journal, which reflect how people live in this country or what our politics are like.

MRS. GOULD: In university English courses they study J. Fenimore Cooper.

MR. GOULD: A Russian collection of English poetry, a book we bought in Leningrad,

JOKES HEARD IN RUSSIA

Among the Russian people there have always been some pretty bitter jokes about their leaders told furtively. Today you can hear them repeated more openly. In such stories Nikita S. Khrushchev, First Secretary of the Communist Party, is always called "Nicky" as in the following:

At the Twentieth Party Congress Nicky made a speech, promising that consumer goods of every kind and in abundance would soon be available to the Russian people. Comrade Abramovitch, a delegate to the congress, stood up to ask, "In what store will there be meat, Comrade Khrushchev?"

Nicky, annoyed: "In every store, of course."

Next day Steinberg, Abramovitch's friend, arose in the meeting. Before he could even ask to be heard Khrushchev saw him and said, "Well, Comrade, I suppose you want to ask where there will be shoes or something?"

"No," said Steinberg. "But where is Abramovitch?"

•

Two Russians were riding in a train compartment with an MVD officer. The officer fell asleep and, to play a joke on him, the others began imitating a Voice of America broadcast.

Not quite awake, the MVD man jumped to his feet and began to jam the broadcast vocally.

■

QUESTION: Why is life in Russia like an airplane?

ANSWER: Because it offers wide prospects, it is sickening, and it is impossible to get out.

•

To repeat an oft-heard joke:

"Granny, what kind of a man is Khrushchev?"

"We don't know yet, dear. We won't know until he's dead."

■

Whether downgraded Stalin should still lie beside Lenin in the magnificent mausoleum on Red Square is a problem embarrassing to officials.

This has led to the anonymous quotation: "Well, there's one solution that would be popular. Remove Stalin and put Khrushchev in his place."

contained almost entirely poems about slavery or oppression of workers—mostly written fifty to a hundred years ago.

MRS. GOULD: However, Russia is returning to a sense of pride in its own culture. Onion domes of ancient cathedrals are being recovered with gold leaf. Enchanting seventeenth- and eighteenth-century palaces of Peter and Catherine the Great are being restored and refitted with beautiful original furniture, Dresden china and paintings.

MR. GOULD: The Hermitage Museum in Leningrad, beautifully situated on the Neva River, is the former czarist winter palace, two city blocks square. It is a treasure house of furniture, historical mementos and world-wide art—the Russians always collected art. Daily it is filled with soldiers, housewives, workers, school children, singly and in groups. We'd heard the Hermitage had some good French Impressionists, but we weren't prepared for what we saw. There were whole rooms of Gauguin, of Matisse, fine Picassos, Renoirs, Van Goghs, Monet and Manet. Many of these the world has never seen.

MRS. GOULD: Several Moscow merchants brought them from Paris in the early 1900's.

MR. GOULD: We went into the Treasure Room, opened by special permission. Russian crown jewels from Ivan the Terrible and Catherine the Great down to the last czars were of Arabian Nights splendor.

MRS. GOULD: Diamonds, rubies, emeralds by the handful, big as pigeons' eggs. The whole thing is priceless. No craftsmen exist today to make toilet sets of such exquisite workmanship, brooches, snuffboxes, diamond-headed canes, sparkling saddle cloths, flower clusters with jewels as big as your thumb.

★

Question: Isn't it amazing these weren't dispersed during the revolution?

MR. GOULD: I suppose some were scattered. But enough remains.

MRS. GOULD: We told our guide in Leningrad we loved to walk—which I always do in a strange city. So after a trip with the guide we said we wouldn't need her any more; we could walk back to the hotel. We walked, and when we came to a big apartment building which we had previously noticed, we went through a small archway into the courtyard. Outside, women with picks and shovels were repairing a streetcar track.

The building, probably eighteen to twenty years old, faced directly on the street, its front divided into small dress or food shops. Grandmothers were sitting on benches in the bleak, littered courtyard, watching young children at play. Other women scurried back and forth with shopping baskets, carrying wood or laundry.

Finally we found one woman alone at a doorway and our young American interpreter asked her a few questions in Russian: this seemed a pleasant building—did she live here? Were there all the conveniences—even hot running water? We told her that we were American tourists and we would love to see how some Russian people lived.

Finally she said she would take us up to her apartment. She was short, about forty-five (looking about sixty by our standards), with the usual somber heavy coat, cloth boots, wool shawl over her head. She took us up two flights of iron stairs. The building inside and out had the run-down, shabby look of our old apartment houses on the side streets around 116th to 125th Street in New York. A little, square foyer about four by seven was filled with potatoes, overcoats, marketing baskets, washboard, buckets, coats, shovel, brooms and the smell that pursues you everywhere in Russia—a smell of old coats, never cleaned because each

Report on Russian Youth

Among American visitors to Russia late in 1956 was Robert Griscom, a college graduate who spoke Russian fluently, had a gift for observation and for acquiring information in sidewalk discussions. In Moscow, Leningrad, Odessa, Kiev, Stalingrad, Rostov and other cities, as well as in villages and farming areas, this young man talked freely with Russians—most of them young men and women between the ages of eighteen and twenty-eight. He found young Russians avidly interested in American jazz, curious about every phase of life in the U.S.A., restless and often contemptuous of the totalitarian restrictions under which they live, frank about their sex life, and always aware that "the Terror" of Stalinism may suddenly return. Usually Griscom did not need to explain that he is an American, because he wore a raincoat. ("A raincoat is a dead giveaway to a Russian; they're too expensive for them.")

Here, from his diary, are excerpts of these conversations and observations:

You see people in greater numbers on the streets of Moscow than I've seen anywhere else in Russia. Many young people—men and girls—shabbily dressed in something resembling Western style, stroll rather jauntily in groups of two or four. Many of the five- or six-story buildings lining the main streets look badly decayed. There is fantastic shoving in the lines at subway stations and a good deal of sneaking into and out of place. Militiamen were polite and everywhere in evidence. People everywhere were making a fuss over their small children.

My Intourist guide today was a serious and rather shifty fellow who was very displeased when I declined to visit the standard tourist attractions in Moscow. He showed an ill-concealed interest in my three-color pen, although when I kidded him lightly about it he made a big show of disinterest and launched into a discussion with our driver. He would not get off the Party line on any political subject. He claimed there is a public reading room in Moscow where anyone may read such U.S. periodicals as Life, Look and the New York Times. He said there is also a room in the Lenin Library where these publications may be read, although they are reserved for students.

Spent the entire evening until 1:30 strolling the streets, meeting some amazing young people and having my first taste of what it is like to live in a closed society. The first approach was on Kuznetsky Most [a street in Moscow just below the Kremlin]. I asked a man where American books are for sale and was directed to a bookstore up the street. As I started off I noticed that a young passer-by had turned around and was following me, so I stopped in front of a photographer's shop to look at the photographs in the window. He came up and helpfully identified the ballerinas in the photographs. Then he asked shyly if the quality of American photography isn't better than these Soviet examples.

All of a sudden there were eight or ten kids around me, half of them girls, all between seventeen and twenty-five years old. All of them said they are members of the Komsomol. They were alert, friendly and full of questions about life in the United States. They showed great interest in our sports—the girls as well as the boys. They asked about salaries, my personal history, films and books. They wanted to know what Soviet films and authors I knew and were glad to hear we can read Soviet publications in the U. S.

They all confirmed that Komsomol members do not believe in God and cannot go to church, according to the rules of the organization. They admitted that they had heard BBC [British Broadcasting Company] broadcasts, the Voice of America, and sometimes Radio Liberation and Radio Turkey. They conceded that these foreign broadcasts often give them news which is not available domestically. In general they didn't want to talk politics, although the boys were less reticent than the girls.

Around 11:45 the girls headed for home and, with a few of the boys, I walked to the corner of Gorky Street and met a new group of boys. Immediately I noticed a different attitude—open criticism of the regime. They were quick to ask if I knew "how things are here." They wanted to know the price of the suit I was wearing, my fountain pen, nylon shirt and tie. One boy said he had been able to buy Stan Kenton and Louis Armstrong records from a "friend," as well as a book by Irwin Shaw. They asked eagerly if I had any U. S. books. Their ideas of U. S. prices were more favorable than, in fact, is correct and later it became clear that, in their general hatred of their own life, they have built up an overglamorized picture of life outside the Soviet Union. These boys said that they despise the police. One knew enough English to call them "our bureau of investigation."

When I asked about the public reading room for foreign periodicals, they told me this is a Party lie. I asked who might go to such a reading room, if not the public. They pointed to the Kremlin and said with a sneer, "Only they!"

There was much complaining about their internal passport system, especially the propiska section in which the passport holder's address must be stated, the number of people living there, and other personal information. They are required to register every year or so and if anyone fails to do

THE DECEPTION

By ETHEL EDISON GORDON

There wasn't much work being done in the office anyway, since tonight was New Year's Eve, and so Kate simply took her coat under her arm and slipped out; she crossed the street to the parking lot and drove out to Idlewild to meet Nick.

It was a gray day with a thick, mottled sky that said snow, but a snowy New Year's Eve went companionably with fires in fireplaces in snug houses in the country, it went fine with home-comings. Nick had missed Christmas home this year: he'd had a bad break and couldn't see someone until the thirtieth; and after all, she could hardly expect him to fly home and then have to fly right back to Marseille, just in order to spare her a lonely Christmas. So it had been a lonely Christmas, almost as bad as the two wartime Christmases they had been apart, but now he was coming home, and last night she had driven out to Eastport with Hilda and had helped open the house and polish it to a luster—it was three before she had gone to bed!—and today Hilda was baking a cake just to give the house the right smell for a holiday, a home-coming. Home-coming! Anyone would think he'd been gone for a year instead of five weeks, anyone would think they were newlyweds, instead of having celebrated their tenth wedding anniversary!

She watched Nick's plane circling high over the field for a landing, and suddenly she had a picture of herself and Nick as they might seem to some hypothetical stranger. With the hypothetical stranger she peered into the plane to see Nick, sitting there with his air of steady, quiet competence, with his nice brown eyes and straight brown hair. He'd be craning his head as if he could see down to the field where she'd be waiting, and the hypothetical stranger might turn from him to her, thinking, That's a lucky girl this man is anxious to see: what's she like? Tallish, chic—well, maybe a little too much of her to be truly chic; Size 14 these days was almost huge in a world overrun by subdeb sizes, but pretty, especially now with her cheeks pink with anticipation. Looks very happy, the observer would think, no wonder, waiting to kiss and be kissed by that nice man. Rich? Well, she's wearing an expensively sleek brown seal (wholesale, one advantage of working for Marcel Avante, paid for out of Nick's and her bonus checks) and he's flying on one of those de luxe flights (expense account, paid for by French and Allied Importers) and there's the house in Eastport, ancestral, maybe, he might think, noting its fine old lines and well-preserved age, and acreage (two), but he'd be wrong there—there were thirteen years to go before the house in Eastport would be paid off. They had bought it only two years ago because it was about time they put down roots. You needed roots when your husband went abroad twice a year, when you also occasionally skipped to Paris or London or Madrid for the showings, when you had nothing tangible to show for ten years of marriage, nothing except a boundless love, and that wasn't actually a tangible.

Sometimes it was. The plane was in, steps were wheeled up, the stewardess came out, the first passenger, and then Nick, his eyes searching for her. She waved frantically, and met him at the door. "How was it?" they both said at once, and then, together, "Too bad about Christmas," and then they burst out laughing, only there were tears in her eyes.

"I'm sorry, Kate," he said. "It just couldn't be helped."

"I've forgotten all about that," she said, brushing her eyes. "I'm just happy you're home."

"Wait here. I'll be through in a minute." She waited in the corridor until he came out of the Customs shed, and then he took her arm. "Want some coffee?"

"I can wait until we get home."

"Eastport?" he said. "You opened the house?"

"It's a surprise. You're glad, aren't you?"

He grinned. "It's what the doctor ordered."

He took her keys and when they had settled smoothly into the moving line of

The McNultys, of Toluca Lake, merge careers—

In den, Jim does most of his work and Ann studies. Red wallpaper, maple breakfast furniture give the room glow. One wall, all windowed, faces on back play yard.

The comfortable McNulty house in Toluca Lake is often animated with party plans. Soft lamplight, fresh flowers and appetizing sizzle from the kitchen create the kind of atmosphere Jim and Ann enjoy most. Mrs. McNulty, a part-time gardener when not before the cameras as screen star Ann Blyth, arranges roses on the hall table. Dr. Jim, working on case notes, stops in the nursery to check on two-year-old Timmie and redheaded baby Maureen as white-starched Teresa puts them to bed.

When Jim is not at work at St. Vincent's Hospital and Ann is free of dramatic roles and such extras as singing in Las Vegas, the household invites in its friends, relatives and neighbors. "We're part of a clan," says Jim, "when it comes to family." His own sister and four brothers, including tenor Dennis Day, all live nearby, and Timmie and Maureen have twenty cousins to invite to birthday parties. Ann's own uncle and aunt live just eight blocks away and are frequent callers at the house on the quiet green street. To younger members of her neighborhood, Ann is known simply as "Timmie's mother." To the parents in the other big houses that line the road, the McNultys are both star inhabitants and good neighbors asked over for dips in the pool because so far they haven't built one themselves, "postponing it till we're past the toddler stage." Instead, the broad green lawns behind the McNulty home are intersected by a patio where guests gather on an afternoon, a barbecue where Jim presides over steak and baked potatoes on a weekend. ("My specialty," he says of the potatoes; "done to a turn and served with butter, chives and sour cream.") There is a badminton court, and scattered on the lawn are whole sets of water-shedding canvas chairs. On a Wednesday afternoon off, Jim can sprawl in California sun undismayed by his son's favorite game of playing lash" by turning the hose on him. "We bought house," says Jim, "because it was a family sort place."

The big home with its off-white exterior, cocoa-ored shingled roof and wide bay windows es the world congenially under shady oak and gnolia trees. The curving front driveway ac-nmodates the six or eight cars parked on an eve-g when the McNultys are entertaining, one of n's favorite occupations. In the kitchen a ca-er who comes by the day works with the cook a menu of roast beef with crab apples, golden-zed ham, salads and vegetables and relishes to followed by a creamily frosted cake.

"We have a system for entertaining now," says n. "We hire a firm that rents tables and chairs, ing our two couches from the fireplace and ainst the wall, and have room for twenty or re people." To the round dining tables made tive with pink linen cloths, silver, crystal and ndle-and-carnation centerpieces, the guests carry tes from a buffet assortment on the dining-om table. ("The dining room is too formal for kind of evening we enjoy—it would hold us down to having six guests at a time," Jim says.) Moving to the Early American den after dinner, guests and the McNultys catch up on news of one another's work and families.

In the two-career household, the children are the center of any free hours. On most evenings Ann, who leaves the cameras at six, is home at seven, about the time her husband arrives. Since the cook will have dinner ready at eight, there's always time for a nursery hour of storytelling and toy tinkering.

"Vacations haven't been too easy to manage, though," Jim has found when their careers conflict—his weeks between hospital duties have to jibe with Ann's between pictures—"and so far we haven't been away together for more than seven days at a time." Conscientious Jim, his wife will tell you, is a "twenty-four-hour-a-day doctor." A telephone call from a patient has more than once interrupted a trip, meal or night's sleep. "With lives at stake you learn to say good-by to your husband on short notice."

The fact that she and Jim ever met to say hello still surprises her. CONTINUED ON PAGE 104

SPRING

The first spring hats will come early this year, like roses in the snow, and will be worn early. The most important silhouette is the cloche with a draped crown, worn jauntily a little to the side. White is the great fashion, in felt for immediate wear, later in organdy and straw. And everyone will want a flower hat—from gay little field-flower helmets to big puffs of rose petals. Veils have tremendous glamour, unexpected and lovely on a wide-brimmed pink felt or a rough straw.

Jewelry is chosen for color as a nosegay might be, reflecting the blues, pinks, mauves of fashion. Delicate heels, pointed toes and a great diversity of bows indicate still more feminine shoes. ▪ By WILHELA CUSHMAN

Gem of a wardrobe

Spring is the season for delectable colors, beautiful silk prints and featherweight woolens. We planned our Gem of a Wardrobe around a lovely periwinkle-blue coating. The design, though simple, has a custom-made touch in the hand stitching on the collar, cuffs and pockets. Our suit is a chiffon-weight pale gray flannel with an exceptionally well-cut eight-gore skirt—the kind of skirt you will like to wear separately with a pretty white shirt. A silk-shantung shirtwaist dress is a "gem" in every wardrobe and is everlastingly gay. Ours, in cherry red, goes handsomely under the blue coat. The twin print (silk organza over a matching printed silk shantung) does double duty inasmuch as you can wear them separately or together. The sheer has a simple bodice with a delightfully full skirt with a ten-yard sweep. The shantung has a less full skirt and a strapless bodice. Clothes such as these, with beautiful "dressmaker" details, are yours for the making at a fraction of what they would cost ready-made.

By NORA O'LEARY Pattern Editor of the Journal

A "gem" of a coat must go easily over all the other clothes in your wardrobe; the color should blend and the line should be becoming. Ours has a comfortable sleeve that goes easily over suits and has hand-stitched details. Vogue Design No. 9080, 10 to 20. Flower hat by Adolfo for Emme.

A bright silk-shantung shirtwaist dress gives a lift to any wardrobe. This one has a skirt with soft unpressed pleats and an easy bodice with a slightly away-from-the-neckline collar. Vogue Design No. 9083, 10 to 18. Nettie Rosenstein gold medallion.

To match the "slip" of our dinner dress, we have shortened an Orlon sweater to bolero length and faced it with grosgrain. Then we appliquéd several flowers from the fabric.

This lovely lightweight flannel suit is a true gem. It has a simple jacket and an eight-gore skirt which we find is becoming to most figures. We also show the skirt with a classic Dacron-and-cotton monogrammed shirt (a transfer design is included in your pattern). Suit is Vogue Design No. 9078, 10 to 40. Blouse, Vogue Design No. 9075, 10 to 20.

Basis for Spring in:

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Closer now to forecasts of "fair and warmer," we find Barbara J. concentrating on the first of a season's purchases. She feels this costume is one of those very extra-special ones—foretelling bright skies and sunny days to come. Common sense and fashion sense tell her it should be a true basic to be worn under her winter coat on chilly days . . . or on sunny ones to stand on its very own. She mentally takes count of what she already has in her wardrobe and carefully shops the stores on a Saturday. Perhaps we can diagnose it as spring fever, but Barbara wants to "be really in love" with this first spring outfit!

On that first wonderfully warm day, Barbara sees—and succumbs completely to—one wonderful dress with its own matching jacket. It is in a heavenly shade of blue, a sheer soft wool. The lightness has the touch of spring, the color foretells brighter things to come. But—Barbara still has count of her fashion $'s (and in this case we should truly say pennies!). The price, $22.95, is really two investments in one: a suit to wear everywhere, a classic of a dress loving any and all appearances. Some she will practice now—others she will hold in abeyance to wield on a special date or a surprise occasion. By BET HART

Barbara wears THE SUIT . . . shown here with exactly the same accessories as she had last fall. (We admit to different flowers, but there's a new beau!) Barbara's additions to this:

White collar and cuffs in piqué or linen—or her satin ones for an evening. A pin on the pocket to accent this special detail.

A wide matching cummerbund to emphasize a tiny waistline and silhouette the pretty outline of the jacket. (For the young in heart, try it in a bright clear lemon yellow.)

A bow, either in organza or in a surah polka dot, to wear with or without the collar and cuffs.

The neckline worn open, filled with a scarf, pearls or flowers (real or those that just look so).

THE DRESS—absolutely basic, loving to be worn alone or accepting one outspoken detail. Here a wide cummerbund, a cluster of spring violets in a heavenly shade. Barbara also sees:

A lovely ribbon to soften the neckline! She thinks of this in terms of pinks or blues.

A 1" white piqué bias around the neckline and sleeves. Wear with or without narrow leather belt. A perfect basic for the office.

A narrow matching ribbon completely encircling a high midriff—a different look from a different emphasis.

Or she can choose . . . her turquoise cummerbund, a scarf tied loosely around the neckline fastened with her sparkle pin; or for a completely different costume, her white sweater from last month.

Dottie Robinson helps Barbara put up permanent. As you see, there is no complicated sectioning off of hair. Only the ends of hair are being permanented to achieve a soft, natural look.

Barbara combs out the permanent. She could have worn it this way, prettily, without further ado. However, she found it slightly too curly and thought—rightly—that a shampoo and set would loosen the curls and give a softer effect.

Barbara is pictured immediately after the shampoo and set. A lift of curl at the temples—soft waves and curls at the sides and ends. Very pretty—but will it last?

The diary of a Home permanent

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN

Beauty Editor of the Journal

Yes! Here's Barbara six weeks later. This picture was taken four days after her last shampoo. The only pin-ups required—three fat curls on each side. Operation Permanent considered a success!

Pretty Barbara Shook, of the JOURNAL staff, has thick, sparkly dark brown hair. "But it doesn't have a speck of natural curl," said Barbara. "I have to put it up every night, and even so, if it's damp or raining the next day, I arrive at the office with my hair hanging in straggles. Oh, for a permanent that would give me just the softest curl on the ends of my hair, that would last despite the weather, and eliminate the need of fussing with it every night."

We told Barbara we felt sure we could give her the kind of permanent she wanted. "First," we suggested, "have your hair cut about an inch and a half and have it thinned and shaped so that we will begin the permanent on fresh, even lengths of hair." Then we asked, "In return for our favor, how about keeping a diary of the way your hair behaves in the six weeks following your permanent?"

Barbara was thrilled at the prospect, thought it would be fun to keep a diary. So here is her own account of how it feels to be a girl with a curl!

FIRST WEEK

Monday. Dottie Robinson and I started the permanent at 10:00 A.M., finished in one hour. This is what we did: Following the directions of the permanent we had decided on, I dampened my hair and parted it in the center as I ordinarily do. Dottie started the curls in the back (an all-thumbs girl needs a helping hand) and worked toward the sides and front. I did those little top curls at the forehead. For each curl, Dottie saturated a section of hair (about 1¾" wide) with the waving lotion, and then combed through the section several times to make sure it was thoroughly saturated. With this type of permanent, the waving lotion is used only at the time you put up the curls (no resaturating necessary) so it is doubly important to see that each section of hair is soaked with it. Then Dottie folded the end paper over the section of hair, slid it down to the ends, and wound the curl, firmly but not tightly, under toward the scalp. When the curl was wound, we then wiped off any excess lotion. We used approximately 24 curlers in all. Three of the curlers were small, to take care of my hair at the bottom back which is shortest and which (poor me) grows very low on my neck. The rest of the curlers were large.

At the end of the hour, I was on my own. With this permanent the hair must dry naturally, no hair dryers allowed. To be on the safe side, we decided I should leave mine up all night. Of course I did have to wear a bandanna over my head for the rest of the day at work. There were lots of double-takes from JOURNAL editors as well as JOURNAL visitors. (I explained: "It's a beauty secret!")

Tuesday. Had my "unveiling" this morning. Pretty start! My hair was immediately easy to comb—no snarls—and, happy day, no signs of frizziness. After a quick shampoo and set, my hair was combed out and I was pleased as I could be. Soft curls at the ends. Soft waves at the sides. "It's a success!" I announced. "Looks very pretty," the beauty department

Other girls ask,

"Why doesn't such a permanent work as well for me?"

WE FIND:

Permanents work best, quite naturally, on hair such as Barbara's—healthy, strong and with a good amount of natural oil.

Brittle and/or dry hair is sometimes apt to frizz at the ends, or to curl too much, or, if the hair is under curled, in the hope of avoiding frizz, it barely curls at all! Regular hot-oil treatments, as many as one each week for six weeks in advance of your permanent, should get your hair in better condition by reducing the dryness. The massaging of hair creams or oils into your scalp will help stimulate your own natural oils. Be sure to shampoo your hair two or three days in advance of your permanent, and brush it often so that some natural oil will be distributed through to the ends. All remnants of an old permanent should be trimmed off before you begin again. When your permanent is finished, give yourself a cream rinse to soften ends. The rinse makes setting easier too. Be sure to select a permanent which has been especially formulated for your type of hair.

If your hair is exceptionally fine in addition to being dry, follow instructions above and be sure you do not wind curls too tight. Put up your curls using fairly large sections of hair on large curling rods. Wind them with gentle firmness toward the scalp. Small rods and too-tight winding will produce shapeless frizz.

Bleached or dyed hair, or hair that has been color-treated in any way, should have several test curls before you proceed with the permanent, to make sure the permanent will take and that it will not cause damage. Rod-curl permanents are generally advised for your type of hair. (If the color has made your hair dry or "fuzzy," see suggestions above.)

If your hair persists in looking hangdog and dull, despite the conscientious care you give it, check up on your physical condition. Lifeless-looking hair is sometimes a sign of impaired health.

THE S

A PEGOAT

by DAPHNE du MAURIER

Every word he spoke committed him more deeply.
Every act involved him more completely in their lives.
There was no way out.

IV I sat down on the chair beside the bed. The gap between us lessened, and I was someone on her level, not just an adult talking to a child. "The watch was really an excuse," I said. "I didn't want to shoot tomorrow. I didn't know how to get out of it, and then, standing by the bonfire, the idea came to me to burn my hand. It was stupid, and it hurt more than I intended."

She listened calmly. "May I see the watch again?" I felt in my pocket and gave it to her. "Poor thing," she said; "he's black, and he has no glass. Everyone was wondering at lunch why you should take so much trouble to rescue him. I kept my secret to myself. I did not tell them you had thrown him into the fire. It was rather a shame to make the watch suffer. Didn't you think about that?"

"Not exactly," I said. "I was a bit muddled in my mind. I was thinking about someone who had been shot, murdered, a long time ago, and in a flash I'd thrown the watch in the fire and burned my hand pulling it out again. It was as quick as that."

She nodded. "I suppose you were thinking about Monsieur Duval," she said.

I stared at her, surprised. "What do you know about Monsieur Duval?"

"He was master at the verrerie," she said, "and according to Germaine some say he was a patriot and some say he was a traitor. But he had a horrid death and I'm forbidden to talk about it." She handed me back the watch.

"Who told you not to talk about it?" I asked.

"Gran'mie," she said. "Ages ago, when I first heard the story from Germaine. I was telling it to gran'mie and she said, 'Shut up. Never repeat servants' gossip. It's a string of lies.' She was very angry. Tell me, papa, why don't you want to shoot tomorrow?"

Here was the question, and I did not know how to answer it.

"I just don't," I said. "I have no reason."

"You must have a reason," she insisted. "Is it because you don't want to kill?"

I should have told her instantly no, that my reason for not wanting to shoot was that I was afraid of shooting badly, but instead I hesitated, seeking a loophole for escape. "Perhaps," I said at last.

As soon as I had spoken I realized my mistake. I had not deliberately lied to her before. Now I was doing so. I was building for her a false image of Jean de Gué, giving her what she asked for so that I might be spared from truth myself.

She knelt up in bed and, careful not to touch my bandaged hand, put her arms round my neck. "I think you've shown great courage," she said. "It's just like in St. Matthew: 'Wherefore if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out.' I'm glad it wasn't your eye; that would have been much more difficult. As it is, your hand will heal; but still, it was the intention that matters, or so Aunt Blanche always says. It's a pity we can't tell her, though I'd rather we kept it as a secret between us both."

"Listen," I told her, "there's no need to make a great mystery of this business. I burned my hand, I can't shoot, I don't want to shoot, and there's an end to it. Now forget it."

She smiled, and bent down and kissed my bandaged hand. "I promise I won't mention it," she said, "but you can't prevent me from thinking about it. If you see me looking at you tomorrow in a very particular way, it will mean I am thinking of your great act of humiliation. Papa, Aunt Blanche would like me to be a nun. She says I shall never find happiness in this world, and I believe she is right. I think so more especially now I am reading about the Little Flower. What do you think?"

I looked at her. She was standing up now, small and serious in her white nightgown, her hands crossed.

"I don't know," I said. "I think you're a bit young to decide. Just because Aunt Blanche hasn't found happiness in the world, it doesn't mean you won't. It all depends what you mean by happiness. Ask Monsieur le Curé, don't ask me."

"I have. He says that if I pray hard enough, one of these days God will show me the answer." She sighed and settled herself in bed. "Life is a great problem."

"I agree."

"Do you think it would be easier to be somebody else?" she asked.

"That's what I'd like to find out," I told her.

"I wouldn't mind being another child if I could be sure of getting you as my father," she said.

"You're wrong," I told her. "The whole thing is an illusion. Good night."

Oddly, her devotion depressed me. I turned out her light and went downstairs to the dressing room and the camp bed.

I slept restlessly for a few hours, and was wakened by Gaston throwing back the shutters to a gray damp morning with a thin drizzle. Instantly the whole day loomed before me—the shoot, the guests, the ritual of the hours to come—and it seemed to me desperately important that I should let none of the family down. I was aware of footsteps in the corridor and voices on the stairs, and the church bell began to ring for Mass. I thanked heaven I had shaved, and had only to struggle into the dark suit laid out for me—and there was a tap on the door and Marie-Noël came in and was able to help me.

"Why are you so late?" she asked. "Is your hand worse?"

"No," I said. "I'd forgotten the time."

Together we went into the bedroom to wish Françoise good morning, and then downstairs and onto the terrace. We could see the little family party going on ahead—Paul and Renée and Blanche, and on Blanche's arm, huge, massive and bent, a black figure that I did not recognize. I was about to question the child when it suddenly dawned upon me that there was the comtesse herself, whom I had seen only seated or in bed.

We caught up to them and I offered the mother my other arm so that she could lean upon both Blanche and myself. I saw that she was even taller than I had thought: we were of equal height, but her massive frame made her seem taller still.

"What's all this about you burning yourself?" she asked.

We had reached the timbered entrance of the church as I finished my story and the bell ceased ringing.

"I don't believe it," she said. "No one but an imbecile would have done such a thing. Or have you suddenly become one?"

A little knot of village people standing in the porch drew back to let us pass, and as we went through and up

Understanding of the difficulties in a marriage is certainly necessary for its improvement; but action is even more necessary. At the American Institute of Family Relations in Los Angeles we concentrate on the need not merely of acquiring insight but of doing something about it. As a result of action in the right direction, husband and wife quickly gain more insight, more understanding of the origin of their troubles; but meanwhile the troubles themselves are disappearing. In this case Nils and Patsy, serious though their problems undoubtedly were, did not require months of introspection and meditation on their childhood misfortunes. Three interviews were enough for that purpose. What they needed was to go to work on the marriage; to shape new patterns, create new habits more favorable to their happiness. When they thus acted, better understanding followed automatically. The counselor in this case was Mrs. Pearl Schumann.

PAUL POPENOE, SC.D., Director

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

HE: "Hugging and kissing are for kids. I just can't see myself holding hands with a woman I'm married to. The mere idea makes me feel—well—uncomfortable, foolish. I never saw my father kiss my mother."

SHE: "Nils' selfishness, his lack of consideration, his coldness have worn my love for him to a shadow. He shows me no appreciation whatever. Weeks go by when he doesn't kiss me. Sex is all that interests him, and sex without tenderness has very little appeal to me."

PATSY TELLS HER SIDE:

"When Nils bought one one-way ticket to California I was tempted to stay in Baltimore and put an end to our marriage right there," said thirty-four-year-old Patsy. Eastern born and bred, the young woman was burned the brown of a pecan by the Los Angeles sun. "At that time—this happened nearly five years ago—Nils and I hadn't adopted our little boy. We had no responsibilities to hold us together. My husband was as baffling and infuriating to me then as he is today.

"But suppose I fill you in on the details of that move of ours. I suspected Nils was bored with living in the Baltimore neighborhood where my entire family lives—he has no more feeling for his own kinfolk than a fish—but it was only a suspicion. Both he and I were holding good jobs, and after an interminable search we had landed in a dandy apartment. Nils didn't hint he was dissatisfied with the East and was feeling restless. No, that isn't his style.

"I can well remember the afternoon I learned of his intentions. I stopped by the place where he then worked so we could ride home together. His office building was a few doors from an airline ticket office and I saw him turn in there. By the time I followed him inside, he was already at a counter paying for that single passage.

"Nils didn't turn a hair when I stepped up. It seems he'd expected to take me to dinner at our favorite restaurant. At dinner he planned to announce that he personally was all set to fly away and begin a brand-new life. Nils had already quit his job. He had it figured out I could quit mine—I'm a trained nurse—sell our furniture, dispose of our lease, travel three thousand miles across the continent and join him as soon as he found work and another place for us to live.

"It just didn't enter my husband's head that his plans should have been regarded as our plans, that I was entitled to a voice in such an important matter. I had never been separated by more than a hundred miles from my mother and father, my sister and my three brothers, as he was well aware. I was so enraged by his callousness I was so hurt, that I burst into tears. Nils' sole concern, as I recall, was to get me to dry my eyes and to spare him embarrassment in a public place.

"I guess I knew in my heart that if I let him go kiting off by himself it was unlikely the two of us would ever get together again. Anyhow, I spent that night at my parents' home. Nils treats them abominably—he treats his own father even worse—but my mother and dad are thoroughly sold on marriage and they both stand up for him. Everybody in my family agreed a wife's place was at her husband's side. I'm the oldest of the children and pretty much accustomed to getting my own way, but I couldn't hold out against the whole crowd.

"Next morning I bought myself a ticket and a few days later Nils and I flew west on the same plane. He wasn't overly pleased. If anything, he was provoked.

"I resigned my hospital job, I sacrificed the companionship of my family and lifelong friends because I loved Nils. No other reason. To this day I dislike California heartily. Nils and I have done well financially since our move, I'll admit. A year ago we made the down payment on an attractive, two-bathroom house. Our prosperity has brought no joy to me. I'm deeply grateful for our little son—we adopted Kyle three and a half years ago—but even with a child in the house there are many times I'm almost crazed with homesickness and with loneliness.

"Nils' selfishness, his lack of consideration, his coldness have worn my love for him to a shadow. He shows me no appreciation whatever. I regularly did private nursing out here—private nursing is highly paid but involves backbreaking labor—until he could establish himself in the kind of work he enjoys. Nils has yet to say thank you. He is now one of the top credit managers for a big finance company. Nine people work under him. His earnings average ten thousand dollars a year. However, I am still obliged to take occasional nursing cases so we can pay for luxuries—his luxuries.

"Nils glowers if I mail a birthday gift to my mother or send a pair of socks to one of my brothers. But last month he ordered six ten-dollar neckties—six, mind you—and three monogrammed shirts. I returned the neckties, but the shirts couldn't be returned. When Nils first went to work for his present employers, he needed a suit of clothes. One suit. He bought four suits; two were tailor-made. At the time they were delivered I was going barelegged on the street to save money for the white stockings I had to wear at work.

"If Nils had been brought up in luxury it might be easier for me to accept his silly, selfish buying habits. His father was harder hit by the depression than mine and there were twelve children in that family to feed and clothe. Last summer I took our son back east so he could meet his grandparents on both sides. My parents, my sister and my brothers showered Kyle with gifts and love exactly as though he had been born to us. Nils' mother had died a few months earlier. His father just grunted at our child and I forgave because he seemed sad and lonesome.

The Low-Fat Diet

By EVELYN S. STEAD and GLORIA K. WARREN

Delectable desserts, pies, pancakes, meats and salad dressings can be low in fat if you know how to make substitutions.

Twenty recipes are followed by one week's menus.

Many doctors believe that, on the contemporary American scene, more illness is caused by excessive intake of calories and fat than is caused by diets deficient in essential food substances.

The present article is designed primarily for well people who wish to eat less fat, either in the belief that they will be less susceptible to arteriosclerosis (hardening of the arteries) or to control weight.

"A low-fat diet is one of the most practical methods for controlling weight and thus your best insurance for a long life and a healthy one," say the two medical experts, Eugene A. Stead, Jr., M.D., and James V. Warren, M.D.,* of Duke University School of Medicine.

Reduction of fat content in food can result in a way of eating, pleasurable eating, for the rest of your life. Since an ounce of fat supplies more than twice as many calories as an equal amount of carbohydrates or protein, limiting the consumption of fat helps to reduce weight, and low-fat cooking can be practiced for years, not just taken up briefly.

This article is written on the theory that cooking with less fat can be painless and even pleasant. Such a diet, approached with imagination, can turn out to be a treat, not a trial. It can include delicious pies, meringues and ices. We even recommend that you forget the word "diet" and enjoy the eating! In cutting down the fat

*LOW-FAT COOKERY, by Evelyn S. Stead and Gloria K. Warren, published as a book by Blakiston, McGraw-Hill, 1956, contains detailed and technical information as well as 124 pages of recipes which meet the health requirements of those people required to be on a low-fat diet. This article is based on the research and information of these two dietary experts in association with Eugene A. Stead, Jr., M.D., and James V. Warren, M.D., of the School of Medicine at Duke University.

STRAWBERRY MERINGUE PIE

Beat until frothy 3 egg whites. ¼ teaspoon cream of tartar and a pinch of salt. Gradually add ⅔ cup sugar, 2 tablespoons at a time, beating well after each addition. Beat until the meringue stands in stiff peaks. Line a buttered 9″ pie plate with the meringue, covering the bottom and sides evenly, being sure the meringue does not overlap the lip of the plate. Build up an edge about ¼″–½″ above the plate. Bake in a slow oven, 275° F., for 1 hour and 15 to 20 minutes. Cool. Fill with frozen strawberry filling (recipe below). Garnish with strawberries and mint.

Frozen-Strawberry Filling: Combine 1 package frozen strawberries with ¼ cup sugar. Heat until the sugar is dissolved. Cool and add ⅓ cup frozen lemonade concentrate (½ can). Pour 1½ cups liquid dry skim milk into a freezing tray and freeze until the edges are mushy. Pour into a cold bowl and beat until the consistency of whipped cream. Add a few drops of red coloring, if desired. Beat 1 egg white until frothy. Add 2 tablespoons sugar, slowly, beating well after each addition. Fold into whipped milk. Add strawberry mixture. Pour into 3 freezing trays and freeze partially. Place in a chilled bowl and beat again. Return to the freezer and continue freezing overnight. The next day, rebeat until the consistency of ice cream. Freeze until set. Scoop out into pie shell.

BLUEBERRY PANCAKES

Beat 1 egg and add 1 cup buttermilk. Sift together ¾ cup flour, 1 tablespoon sugar, ¼ teaspoon salt and 1 teaspoon baking soda. Combine with the liquids. Fold in 1 cup fresh or frozen blueberries. Lightly grease griddle. Wipe well with paper toweling. Drop spoonfuls of batter on griddle. Cook until golden brown on one side and flip to finish cooking. Pancakes are ready to turn when they bubble in the center. Makes eight 4″ pancakes.

SPECIAL MAYONNAISE

Add ½ teaspoon unflavored gelatin to ¼ cup liquid dry skim milk. Scald 1¼ cups liquid dry skim milk. (Evaporated skim milk may be used if available in your market.) Mix together 2 egg yolks, 2 tablespoons sugar, 1½ teaspoons dry mustard and 1 teaspoon salt. Add a little hot milk to the egg-yolk mixture and mix well. Then add all the rest, including the gelatin, and pour into the top of a double boiler, keeping water in bottom of double boiler just simmering during cooking. Cook, stirring constantly, for 10 minutes or until slightly thickened. Do not overcook. Remove from the heat, add ¼ cup vinegar, slowly, stirring constantly, and then chill well. It thickens as it cools. Makes 1½ cups.

BAKED STUFFED FLOUNDER

Combine ½ package stuffing mix with 1 chicken-bouillon cube dissolved in ½ cup water. Add ¾ cup diced cooked shrimp. Place a 1-pound fillet of flounder on a sheet of aluminum foil laid on a baking sheet. Rub with lemon juice, sprinkle with salt, pepper and monosodium glutamate. Place the stuffing on the fillet and top with another 1-pound fillet of flounder which has been rubbed with lemon juice and sprinkled with salt, pepper and monosodium glutamate. Wrap well in the foil and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 40 minutes. Makes 4 servings.

The silver gleams in the candlelight, the big party dish is a luscious beef, bean and sausage casserole.

Beans to excite the imagination—to make eating an adventure—to prove that flavor has nothing to do with price!

Best Beans I Ever Ate!

Ten supremely delicious bean dishes—lentils combining with savory lamb; Lima beans with tangy sausage, or spareribs;
chili con carne and frijoles—each one could become a family favorite.

You couldn't find a better time of year for beans—this February, when one expects hearty, succulent food from the winter's hospitable casseroles and soup pots. Bring in the big blue-and-white tureen of golden beans, juicy with morsels of tender beef, rosy with tomatoes, fragrant with herbs and spicy sausage chunks that melt on the tongue. Call in family and friends—you'll butter the crisp, thick sticks of toast from the breadbasket, help yourself to the green salad, jeweled with bright radishes and tossed in a dressing spiked with tarragon and mustard. You'll spear spiced crab apples and rings of pickled watermelon to eat with the savory beans, and you'll feast!

"How exquisite is the bean!"—small, snowy marrow beans, baked in the classic New England fashion for a serene eight hours, with a crusty-brown piece of salt pork, and a liberal spooning of molasses to give the whole thing personality. Served with brown bread and creamy coleslaw, of course. Thoughts of lentil or split-pea soup make one long for the day when the ham will be "finished," and the ham bone can lend its sweetness to a pot of thick, delicious soup. Heat up some French bread, toss a salad of lettuce and raw cauliflowerets (buy a pot of chives and snip some into the dressing), and a soup like this becomes a meal. And the taste of dried baby Limas, cooked in the simplest way, simmered to a mealy softness, and liberally buttered and salt-and-peppered, is a lovely thing. Try them instead of potatoes, for a change, with your next roast of lamb.

BEEF, BEAN AND SAUSAGE CASSEROLE

Wash and pick over a 1-pound package of dried white marrow, sometimes called "great northern," beans. In a deep bowl, cover the beans generously with cold water and soak them overnight. Drain and measure the liquid. Add enough water to make 4 cups. (There may be enough anyway.) Pour beans and water plus 2 cans undiluted consommé into a heavy 4-quart kettle. Cover tightly and cook over medium heat while preparing and adding CONTINUED ON PAGE 113

from the Journal Kitchen

February Takes the Cakes There are gossamer cakes, artfully frosted, and sumptuous tortes that linger long in the memory. For each there is a special occasion when the charm of a cake makes the celebration complete. It may be a hearthside reunion over teacups or a salute to George Washington. To honor our first President, bake a velvety smooth and creamy cheesecake, crested with a glistening cherry glaze.

CHERRY CHEESECAKE: Roll or grind a 6-ounce package of zwieback. Mix the crumbs with 4 tablespoons butter and 2 tablespoons sugar. If you favor cinnamon, ¼ teaspoon may be added. Pat the crumb mixture into the bottom and up the sides of a 10″ spring form pan 2½″ deep. Blend 1 cup cream into 1 pound cream cheese. Add 1 cup sugar thoroughly mixed with 2 tablespoons flour and ¼ teaspoon salt. Separate 3 eggs. Beat the yolks until light and thick. Fold them in carefully and flavor with 1 teaspoon vanilla and ¾ teaspoon grated lemon rind. Beat the 3 egg whites to a stiff foam and fold in last as gingerly as you would handle your Aunt Eliza's best bone china. Pour the mixture into the crumb crust and bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., about 1 hour or until firm and lightly browned. Leave in the oven an hour with the heat off. Cool thoroughly.

CHERRY TOPPING: Drain 1 No. 2 can (1 pound 5 ounces) pitted red sour cherries packed in heavy sirup. Measure out ¾ cup of the sirup. Mix 2 tablespoons cornstarch with ⅓ cup sugar in a small saucepan. Gradually add the cherry sirup and ⅛ teaspoon grated lemon rind. Heat, and stir constantly until thick. Continue cooking over low heat about 15 minutes. Add the drained cherries. Cool a little. Pour on top of the cooled cheesecake. Spread the cherries to ½″ from the edge. Cool before cutting.

When the flag's aloft for Abraham Lincoln, cut slices of a handsome chocolate roll mantled with whipped cream and shaved chocolate.

CHOCOLATE ROLL: Sift together 3 times: 6 tablespoons cake flour, 6 tablespoons cocoa, ¼ teaspoon salt and ¾ teaspoon baking powder. Separate 4 eggs. Beat whites until they form soft peaks. Fold ¾ cup sugar into the egg whites gradually, a tablespoon at a time exactly as if you were making meringue kisses. Beat the 4 egg yolks until very thick and lemon-colored. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and fold in the egg-white-and-sugar meringue. Then fold in the sifted dry ingredients carefully. Grease a shallow jelly-roll pan, 10″x15″. Line with waxed paper and grease again. Pour in the batter and spread out evenly. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., 12–15 minutes. Quickly cut off the crisp edges of the cake. Turn out on a cloth sprinkled with confectioners' sugar and tear off the paper. Roll up, rolling the cloth in at one end. Cool on a rack. Unroll. Spread with whipped cream sweetened and flavored with rum extract. Roll up again and frost with more whipped cream. Chill in the refrigerator 1 to 2 hours. Sprinkle with shaved chocolate before serving.

Say it with hearts and flowers: a Valentine cake lace-edged with coconut—pink and red, red roses which speak of love.

To a Queen's Taste Mrs. Helen M. Harris, of Massachusetts, sent us the recipe for Queen Elizabeth's Favorite Cake. A friend had brought it to her from a bazaar in England to which the queen had contributed several of these cakes along with the recipe.

FAVORITE CAKE: Pour 1 cup boiling water over 1 cup chopped, pitted dates and 1 teaspoon soda. Allow to stand while mixing the cake batter: Cream ⅓ cup softened butter with 1 cup sugar until very smooth and creamy. Add 1 egg and 1 teaspoon vanilla and beat well. Sift together 1½ cups flour, 1 teaspoon baking powder and ½ teaspoon salt. Mix until well blended with the creamed mixture. Stir in ½ cup chopped walnuts and the date mixture. Pour into a greased and floured 13″x 9″x2″ cake pan. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 35 minutes. Cool. Frost as desired.

VALENTINE CAKE

Here's a real sweetheart of a dessert for that sentimental day. Bake two 9″ layers of white cake. Cool. Make a two-egg-white batch of 7-minute frosting. Save ¾ cup and tint the rest soft pink. Use the pink frosting to fill and cover cake. In the center of the top of cake trace a heart with a toothpick. Outline with a piping of the ¾ cup of white frosting. Fill heart with softened red jelly and drift coconut over the rest of the cake.

Men Vote for Chocolate Most men, including Dwight D. Eisenhower, will say "chocolate" if polled on their favorite cake—rich, moist and dark of chocolate, with plenty of icing. Though we have printed dozens that fit this description, the latest to be shared with you comes from Mrs. Emerson Payne, of Quebec, Canada.

ALL-CHOCOLATE CAKE: Into a small bowl pour ½ cup boiling coffee or water over 2 squares unsweetened chocolate, stirring well until chocolate has melted. Cream together ½ cup butter and 2 cups brown sugar until light and fluffy. Add 2 large eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Sift together 2 cups sifted flour, 1 teaspoon baking soda and ½ teaspoon salt. Add to sugar mixture alternately with ½ cup sour milk. Then add chocolate mixture and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Mix well. Pour into an 8″-square baking pan lined with waxed paper. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for about 1 hour.

CHOCOLATE-MARSHMALLOW ICING: In the top of a double boiler place 2 squares unsweetened chocolate, ⅔ cup bite-sized marshmallows, 1 beaten egg, 1 teaspoon butter, ½ teaspoon vanilla and a pinch of salt. Stir together for a few minutes until the marshmallows are melted and the icing is combined. Then fold in another ⅔ cup bite-sized marshmallows and spread on the top of the cake.

Beauty Treatments for Cakes

BRAZIL-NUT CURLS: For paper-thin curls, use a vegetable peeler. Slice along the length of the shelled Brazil nut, using quick, short strokes, so that the pieces curl as you slice. Nuts should be at room temperature for best results.

EASY ORNAMENTAL FROSTING: Make your best boiled frosting—not 7-minute in this case. Frost layer cake or tea cakes, but set aside 1 cup of frosting. Into this fold ¼ cup butter that has been creamed until very soft. Tint as desired with food coloring, using pink and green to duplicate our rosebud cakes. Chill for about ½ hour, or until the consistency of a butter frosting. Then pipe flowers or other designs on cake through a pastry tube. This is two frostings in one!

to our places, the comtesse still leaning upon Blanche and myself, I thought how incongruous it was that the family of De Gué came here to pray and ask forgiveness of their sins, when two members of it had not spoken to each other for fifteen years.

I had thought that once inside the church and taking part in Mass, I might forget the masquerade and become the seigneur of St. Gilles indeed. Instead, a latent sense of guilt rose to confuse me. Never had an office seemed so long, so pregnant with inner meaning, yet heard with such lack of grace. When it was over and we shuffled down the aisle, the comtesse leaning heavily on my arm, the first words she muttered were, "I suppose that fool Renée is going to doll herself up like a parrot because Françoise is in bed. I've a good mind to stay downstairs and spoil her fun."

Blanche came to take her other arm, and the three of us went slowly down the hill back to the château. So we entered the domaine, brother and sister mute on either side of the mother, who professed herself delighted to see the rain, for the day would be a failure. "And so," she said, squeezing my arm, "you'll have the laugh of them after all."

We were on the terrace by half past ten, standing in mizzling rain as the first cars drove through the gateway. Poor Renée was hidden from view by the massive figure of her mother-in-law, who, leaning on a stick, a great shawl covering her shoulders, stood in the place of honor, regally offering a word of welcome to each as he arrived. Because her appearance was so unexpected, even the burned hand of the seigneur was passed off as a small mishap. Madame la Comtesse was "receiving"; nothing else counted.

The transformation was complete. I could hardly believe that the woman who stood here in command, holding court, was the one I had seen crouching in her chair upstairs or lying gray and exhausted in the great double bed. Every remark she made held in its tail a sting about the day's proceedings. "Better pick chestnuts and leave your gun behind," to one; and to another, "If you want some exercise, take my terriers for a walk. They'll give you more sport in ten minutes than Paul will in five hours."

I stood apart, not wishing to be involved in her malice. Paul, nervy and harassed, was looking at his watch, anxious to be off, his time schedule already behindhand, when I felt someone touch my elbow. It was the man in overalls who lived in the cottage by the garage, and he had César by his side.

"Here is César, Monsieur le Comte," he said. "You had forgotten to loose him before church."

"I'm not shooting today," I said. "Take him to Monsieur Paul."

The dog, excited to be loose, roamed round searching for his master, took no notice when Paul called him to heel. In his bewilderment he charged a rival, a well-trained retriever, and immediately there was an uproar. The gardener Joseph and I hurled ourselves upon the unfortunate César, but I could do little with one hand. Somehow we controlled the dog at last, and had him leashed, everyone laughing at the ridiculous affair except the owner of the dog, and Paul, who as he passed me said, "Another of your jokes, I suppose? It amuses you to start the whole day wrong by letting your half-trained dog run wild."

There was nothing I could do. César's total disregard of me did not look like disobedience on his part, but amused and cynical indifference on mine.

They began to move off in scattered groups. As they disappeared I turned to the comtesse and said, "All right. You set out to ruin the day for Paul and Renée, and you've done it. I hope you're proud of yourself."

She stared at me without comprehension. "What do you mean?" she asked. "I don't understand you."

"You understand me very well," I said. "Here was the one chance for Paul and Renée to show some authority, and you deliberately stood in their way, making a mockery of the whole thing."

Her face turned suddenly gray, whether from shock or anger I could not tell. I had thought we were alone, but Charlotte was waiting for her just inside the hall, and she came forward now and took her arm, and the pair of them turned and began to climb the stairs without a word. There was no sign of Renée, no sign of Blanche; only the child remained as second witness to the scene.

Marie-Noël stood first on one foot and then on the other. "Is your hand hurting?"

"No."

"I thought it must be, and that was why you didn't bother much with the guests. Gran'mie will be ill now. She'll have one of her bad turns. Why were you so cross with her? She only did it for you."

It was no good. All our motives were false. I had tried to do the right thing in the wrong way, or the wrong thing in the right way—I did not know which. My plan had not worked, and neither had the mother's.

"Where's your Aunt Renée?" I asked the child.

"She went upstairs. Her hair was getting spoiled. She also looked as if she was going to cry."

"Tell her Gaston shall take us all in the car to join the chasseurs."

Her face brightened and she ran off.

I asked Gaston to bring round the car, and saw, to my relief, that he was putting a case of wine into the back. The best solution for the day, so far as everybody was concerned, seemed to be refuge in drink. I looked across the drive, and Renée and the child were walking toward us, and with them César.

"We don't want the dog," I called.

They stopped, surprised. "You'll want César for the birds, papa," cried Marie-Noël.

"No," I said. "Since I'm not shooting, there's no need to bring him. I can't manage him with one hand."

"You don't have to," the child said. "He always obeys your command. Come on, César."

"Hasn't he a lead?" said Renée. "Where's his lead?"

I gave in. I could not argue; the day was out of my control. I climbed into the back of the Renault, with the dog on one side of me and the child on the other, Renée in the front and Gaston driving. As we jolted over a rough cart track to the woods and I swayed against César, a mutter rose in his throat.

"What's wrong with César?" asked Renée, looking over her shoulder.

"Papa's teasing him," said the child; "aren't you, papa?"

"No, I'm not," I said. "But somebody's got to see that he's kept on his lead."

Suddenly the car stopped, and we found ourselves quite near to the chasseurs, who were spread out in a thin line along the ride. We nbed out of the car, and I knew instinc-ly that it was a mistake for me to have ne at all, for I hadn't the faintest notion at I ought to do next. Worse still, I saw t my instructions about César had not n followed. He was loose, roaming around he had done in the drive, in a vain search his master.

'Come here, César," I called.

The dog took no notice. He was running ng the line, his progress accompanied by gry shouts of, "Cateh that dog!"

Renée made a click of disapproval. "Really, n, you ought to control him better."

'I knew it was a mistake to bring him," I d. "Marie-Noël, run and fetch him."

he was about to do so when there came uts from within the wood, a whirring nd of flight, and the birds were over our ds. Suddenly the air was filled with the nging of guns, and the bodies of birds came keting down. César, forgetting all he had r been taught, dashed forward unbidden retrieve the nearest bird, which surely, so dog mind must have told him, would be absent master's prey. As he did so, he ran dlong into his enemy of the terrace, the l-trained retriever belonging to the chas-r on my right, whose bird it presumably s. Before the strangled summons "César!" ld rise in my throat, the hideous battle be-en them started once again. The retriever's ster screamed at me, purple in the face, all off your dog!" and the three of us, née, Marie-Noël and I, flung ourselves into melee of infuriated animals. The chasseur irled away from us fire at a couple of -comers that now nged their way ve us, but in his d emotion he ssed them both. He turned to us, e with fury. "What we invited here ?" he yelled. "To made fun of? That's second time you've set your dog on mine. going home."

César, secured at last, was dragged from the ne of action by Renée and the child, and v the other chasseurs came flocking round see what had occurred. Paul, anxious, ar-d in time to see his guest, his gun under his n and his dog limping behind, stalk off de-minedly along the ride toward the road.

'What's wrong with the marquis?" called ul. "I placed him there on purpose; it's the ition he likes best. Wasn't he pleased?"

Out of the sea of faces I saw one I recog-ed. It was the fellow I had seen driving a near the station in Le Mans, the first to take my identity. He was grinning.

'It was Jean playing the fool," he said. "I uldn't think the marquis will ever speak to ner of you again."

'aul turned to me, his face white. "What's idea?" he asked. "Is it because you can't e any fun yourself that you want to ruin day for everyone else?"

Renée, mistakenly, spoke in my defense. "on't be so unfair," she stormed. "Of course n was not playing the fool. His hand was ting him—he nearly fainted."

The guests drifted away discreetly. Nobody hed to listen in to a family row.

I think we had better go home," I said to née, but her face fell, and so did the child's.

We've only watched one drive," said née. "Surely you're not going to take any ice of Paul?"

You both stay," I said. "I've had enough. e, give me the dog."

I seized poor César's leash, and the dog, are of disgrace yet scenting heaven knows at wounded prey that had dragged itself o the woods to die, leaped forward in a den bound, nearly tearing my arm out of socket. We went off together through the od until, breathless and exhausted, we col-sed together upon a heap of cones.

I lit a cigarette with a sigh and, leaning back inst a tree, wondered how far we were m St. Gilles. There was no sound of man or or bird, nothing but the light and dismal patter of the rain. Presently, damp and stiff, my bandaged hand starting to throb, I dragged myself to my feet, and with my hellhound in tow started off once more through the wood.

I could not tell whether we walked north or south, east or west, and César was no help to me. Still leashed, he trotted at my side as docile as a poodle. Suddenly he stiffened and, almost under my feet, a pheasant rose and flew in alarm into the undergrowth ahead. As we scrambled through a belt of narrowing trees another bird took off, and yet another. In the distance I could hear shouts and then a shot, but away to the left of me, and the startled birds were swerving to my right.

Then I saw, some little way ahead, that the trees were clearing. We were coming to another of those broad rides traversing the woods which I had hoped to find before. We stumbled onto it, wet, bedraggled. And I perceived, not twenty yards away, Paul and Robert staring at me, while posted down the ride, like sentinels on guard, the line of chasseurs waited in ignorance for the birds I had prematurely scattered.

Gaston appeared from nowhere with the car. He also had the flask, last seen in the hotel bedroom at Le Mans and now refilled with cognac, which I swallowed, humped on the back seat of the Renault. Through the misty windscreen I watched the disconsolate figures of the sportsmen, balked of their prey, turn and disappear once more through the belt of trees in hopeful quest of more attainable quarry. Gaston, devoted, anxious, suggested that Doctor Lebrun should be summoned to attend me, but he read my symptoms wrongly. My hand was not hurting me, nor was I in a high fever; the flask of cognac was the solace that I needed.

The temptation to perform his duty was always strong; and if the duty were a particularly disagreeable one, the temptation became ungovernable.
JOHN T. MORSE, JR.
Writing of John Quincy Adams

After a while we jolted once again over ruts and muddied ridges. I recollect a low farm building, the trackway beside it already filled with cars, and waiting to welcome me at the doorway the tenant of the farm, immense, red-faced, and his chattering shrimp of a wife. They led me into a huge barn, and I barely had time to huddle in the far corner before the chasseurs entered, thirsty, tired and steamy wet. Servants from the château hastened round with the wine which Gaston had brought. I remember Renée on one side of me and the man from Le Mans upon the other, and Renée telling him in great detail the story of the bonfire. The man started chattering about high finance, coups on the Bourse. My head reeled. Here was the one man who might have helped me—surely he must be the one Béla had spoken of?—and I didn't even know his business or his name.

"I'm flying to London late tonight," he said. "The usual monthly trip. If there's anything I can do for you there, you know where to find me."

In my haze of alcohol, I thought for one crazy instant that he had plumbed my secret. I stared at him, shaken, then said, "What do you mean?"

"Exchange of pounds," he replied briefly. "If you have any English friends, I know how to work it. Easiest thing in the world."

"Friends?" I asked. "Indeed I have English friends," smiling foolishly, knowing myself secure. "I have a very good friend in London who lives near the British Museum. He'd exchange pounds for francs any day of the week, if he could get them." And because I was speaking of the self who sat beside him, and the joke seemed to me exquisitely funny, I added, "Give me a piece of paper and a pen."

He handed me his pocket diary and I wrote my own name and address and gave the diary back to him in drunken solemnity, saying, "Any assistance you give this chap you'll be giving to me; we're closer than brothers." Then I burst out laughing, thinking him extremely stupid not to see the point.

Next I was aware of someone touching my elbow. It was Marie-Noël, and she was saying, "Uncle Paul wants to know if you are going to

How well do you know YOUR HEART?

ALTHOUGH heart disease is our nation's greatest health problem, we can face it today with increasing hope and confidence. Through research, a vast amount of knowledge about the heart and its functions has been accumulated.

As studies continue, there is every justification to anticipate further advances in diagnosis, treatment . . . and perhaps even prevention . . . of various diseases affecting the heart and blood vessels.

While heart disease is a challenge to medical research, it is also a challenge to you. If you are informed about the heart, you can help protect your own and the hearts of your relatives and friends. The following questions and answers may help you to know your heart better . . . and give it the care it deserves.

- Is the heart strong and durable?
Yes . . . the healthy heart is one of the strongest organs in the body and it has remarkable reserves of strength. Despite its immense task, a healthy heart can be nearly as efficient as the years advance as it is at age 20. Even at the older ages, a healthy heart is fully capable of meeting the body's needs.

- Can you do anything to keep your heart in good shape?
Yes . . . you can protect your heart by avoiding sudden or prolonged exertion, watching your diet, avoiding overweight, and by getting the sleep and rest you need. You should also have a medical examination every year. Then if heart trouble is found, prompt treatment may control it and make possible a long and nearly normal way of life.

- Are all heart attacks serious?
Not necessarily . . . because some are mild and the heart can repair itself with care and treatment. In these cases, a person may usually resume normal activities. Even when there are serious complications, patients can often recover if the heart is helped to heal itself. In fact, four out of five of those who withstand their first coronary attack recover and continue to work full time for many years.

- Is there such a thing as "imaginary heart trouble"?
Yes . . . many people think they have heart trouble because of rapid or irregular heart beat, chest pain, and shortness of breath. None of these necessarily means heart disease, but naturally you should consult your doctor about such symptoms. If his examination shows your heart is all right you can forget about the symptoms.

- Are overweight and emotional tension bad for the heart?
Yes . . . overweight taxes the heart and blood vessels, according to many scientific studies. So, try to keep your weight about equal to what you should have weighed between ages 25 and 30. Emotional upsets can make your heart beat faster and your blood pressure go up.

- Can people with heart disease lighten the heart's work?
Yes . . . if they learn how to care for an impaired heart. Plenty of rest, protection against infection, proper diet, and avoidance of hurry, worry and strenuous activities can all help the affected heart to carry on. Of course, treatment given by your doctor is important, but the patient himself can do most to safeguard the heart.

- Is heart disease more prevalent now?
No . . . not when you consider these facts: (1) more people are living longer and reaching ages when the heart's endurance naturally ebbs; (2) heart ailments are diagnosed now with greater accuracy, whereas in the past many deaths actually caused by heart disease were blamed on other causes.

say a few words, or shall he?" Before I could answer the financier was clapping vigorously, and suddenly the whole company was banging and stamping, and the financier was patting me on the shoulder, saying, "Go on, Jean, make a speech." In a haze of alcohol I thought, This is where I make my mark as a seigneur of St. Gilles; I may have ruined the sport this morning, but now I am in form.

"Mesdames et messieurs," I began, "once again it is my pride and pleasure to welcome you upon this happy occasion, and although an accident has prevented me from taking an active part in the proceedings, I am consoled by the fact that my brother has deputized so well. It is not an easy thing to do, to take another's place, as I am perfectly aware. The truth of this was forced upon me only yesterday morning when I was down at the verrerie looking through the accounts." I pulled myself up. What was I saying? The two identities were merging into one. "Be that as it may," I floundered, "I am not here to talk about the verrerie, but about shooting ——"

I felt someone jogging my elbow—it was the financier, scarlet in the face. "Have you gone crazy, you idiot?" In front of me were other faces, puzzled, uneasy, and it dawned upon me that my speech was not entirely a success, and that it would be best to finish it speedily with some jocular remark.

"In conclusion," I said, lifting my glass, "I will only add this—that my damaged hand today surely prevented disaster. The marquis was wise to go home when he did. If I had carried a gun"—and here I paused for emphasis—"some of you present might never have survived." I stopped, oddly relieved to have uttered my own truth, but I could not understand why nobody clapped. Instead there was a shuffling of feet, and everybody began to move away as though the barn had suddenly become unbearably warm and they longed for the open air. My words had been lamentably few, but I could not see how they had in any way been offensive.

Renée was with me again, and Doctor Lebrun. "I think you must have a touch of fever," he said. "It would be wise to get back to the château as soon as possible."

I was in no condition to argue. I allowed myself to be led by Gaston to the car, and as we turned out of the farmyard I could see the straggling line of sportsmen moving off to their afternoon objective. It was still raining, and I did not envy them.

"My speech didn't seem to go down very well," I said to Gaston at my side.

He did not answer for a moment. Then the corner of his mouth twitched. "Monsieur le Comte," he said, "you had a little too much to drink, that was all."

"Was it so noticeable?" I said.

I felt rather than saw the shrug. "People are sensitive," he said, "especially about the past. It doesn't do to mix up war and peace and make a joke of it."

"But I didn't do anything of the sort," I said. "I was speaking of something quite different."

"Excuse me, Monsieur le Comte," he said, "I misunderstood you. So did they."

We drove the few miles back in silence. As I got out of the car, and he stood waiting for further orders, it struck me suddenly that possibly not all the guests would be returning for refreshment later. I put the point to Gaston.

"It is one of those things, Monsieur le Comte," he said, "that are best left to the discretion of those concerned. In any case, if few turn up to drink in the dining room, I can promise you that the kitchen quarters of the château will be completely filled."

I went upstairs and crept softly into the dressing room so as not to disturb Françoise. Throwing myself down on to the bed, I slept instantly. I was wakened by someone whispering in my ear. A figure stood by the bed. It was Germaine, the little femme de chambre.

"Come quickly, Monsieur le Comte," she was saying. "Madame la Comtesse is unwell. She is asking for you."

I sat up, switching on the light. Germaine looked frightened. "Where's Charlotte?" I said. "Has she sent you for me?"

"Charlotte is downstairs, Monsieur le Comte," she whispered. "There is a great crowd in the kitchen eating and drinking. Charlotte told me to stay with Madame la Comtesse because she wanted to join the others below. She said Madame la Comtesse was sleeping and would give no trouble."

I was up now, and struggling into my jacket. At least I was sober again.

"What's the matter with Madame la Comtesse?" I asked.

"I don't know, Monsieur le Comte. She was sleeping, and then she started to groan and to ask for Charlotte, but Charlotte had told me not to go down for her, so I asked if there was anything I could do. I told a lie, I said I could not find Charlotte. Then she asked for you, and said to come at once, no matter what you were doing. I was frightened, she looked so ill."

She followed me out of the dressing room and up the stairs. When we came to the bedroom door I paused, something telling me I should go in alone, and asked Germaine to wait outside. The room was dark. Only a feeble glow from the stove enabled me to distinguish the shape of the furniture, of the bed, and because I did not want to disturb the comtesse by turning on the light, I went to the window and eased the shutter so that a streak of pallor might at least fall upon the carpet and make the darkness gray.

Her voice came to me, faint and strangely guttural, from the depths of the vast bed. "Who is it?"

"It's I, Jean." I moved away from the window and went to her.

"I'm ill," she said. "Why didn't you come before?"

"What do you want me to do?" I asked.

She moved restlessly. "You know perfectly what I want you to do," she said.

There were medicines on the table beside the bed, and I glanced toward them, perplexed, but she shook her head.

"Charlotte keeps it next door," she said, "in the dressing room, in the drawer of the cupboard there. Surely you remember where it is?"

I got up, went into the dressing room, and switched on the light. There was only one cupboard in the room, with a single drawer, and this I opened. Inside were two boxes, one of them still half wrapped in paper which I recognized. It was the gift which I had given into Charlotte's hands that first evening in the château. I took the wrapping off and opened the box. It was full of little ampoules packed one upon the other in layers of cotton wool. They contained liquid, and a label upon each, with the single word "morphine." I opened the other box. It held a hypodermic syringe.

As I stood there, staring, I heard her calling from the bedroom, "Jean, why don't you come?" Slowly I took the syringe out of its box, and one of the ampoules, and laid them on the table below. There was cotton wool on the table, and a bottle containing spirit. I understood at last what it was that Jean de Gué had brought his mother from Paris.

I went back into the bedroom and turned on a light which I found concealed in the hangings of the bed. The woman lying there was not the one who had stood beside me on the terrace that morning, regal and commanding. She kept turning her head from side to side on the pillow in a movement that was horrible and inhuman, like something long imprisoned without food or light or water.

"What are you waiting for?" she said. "Why are you so long?"

I knelt beside her. I put both my hands behind her, and turned her head toward me so that she was forced to look at me and be still.

"I don't want to give it to you," I said.

"Why?"

The staring eyes searched mine and the massive face seemed to crumple, becoming twisted and distorted like a paper mask.

"Why?"

Once again she spoke, this time in anguish, and she pulled herself up in bed and held my shoulders. The mask became a face, and the face hers and mine and Marie-Noël's.

I got up and went into the bathroom. Breaking the neck of the ampoule, I filled the syringe, and came back and prepared her arm with the spirit. Then I drove the needle into her arm and held the syringe and waited, and she leaned back on her pillows and waited too. Her eyelids flickered, and for a moment, before closing them, she looked at me and smiled.

I took the syringe back to the dressing room, washed it and replaced it in the box, and put the empty ampoule in my pocket. Then I shut the door and went and stood by the bedside once again. The anguish had gone from the face, and the likeness too. She was neither Marie-Noël, nor myself, nor the mother of Jean de Gué; she was something sleeping, unconscious, unaware of pain.

I went into the corridor and found Germaine still standing there, waiting. I said to her, "It's all right now. Madame la Comtesse is sleeping. You had better sit by the stove until Charlotte comes up."

I went along the corridor, through the swing door and on to the other landing, and the sound of laughter and music came floating up toward me once again from the back regions of the château. I could hear voices, too, coming from the salon—evidently the guests had not yet gone—and as I walked onto the terrace the door of the salon opened, and Marie-Noël came out.

"Where are you going?" she said.

She had changed into a blue silk frock, white socks and pointed shoes. She wore a little gold cross round her neck, and round her cropped fair hair was a blue velvet band. Her face was flushed with excitement.

"I don't know," I said. "I might not come back."

She knew at once what I meant, because the color went from her face and she made a movement as though to rush at me and seize my hands. Then she remembered my bandaged hand and stood still.

"Is it because of what happened at the shoot?" she asked.

"No," I said, "it has nothing to do with the shoot."

She went on looking at me, her hands clasped, and then she said, "Take me with you."

"How can I?" I asked. "I don't know where I'm going."

It was raining hard, falling onto her thin shoulders in the blue silk party frock. "Will you walk?" she said. "You can't drive because of your hand."

The simplicity of her remark brought me to the full realization that I was without thought or plan. How, indeed, did I intend to get away?

The voices sounded loud again from within the salon. Marie-Noël looked over her shoulder. "They are beginning to say good-by," she said. "You will have to make up your mind what you're going to do."

A footstep sounded in the hall, and someone came and stood in the entrance. It was Blanche.

"You'll catch cold," she said. "Come in out of the rain." She did not see me standing there, she saw only the child, and I realized that, believing herself to be alone with Marie-Noël, her voice had changed. It was gentle and affectionate, the hard, abrupt quality gone. She might have been a different person. "Everybody is going in a moment," she said. "You only have to be polite a few minutes longer. Then I'll come upstairs and read to you, if papa is still sleeping." She turned and went indoors.

The child looked at me. "Go on in," I said. "do what she says. I won't leave you." She smiled. Oddly, the smile reminded me of something. Then I remembered—it was release from pain. I had seen the same smile not ten minutes ago in the room upstairs. Marie-Noël ran back into the château after Blanche.

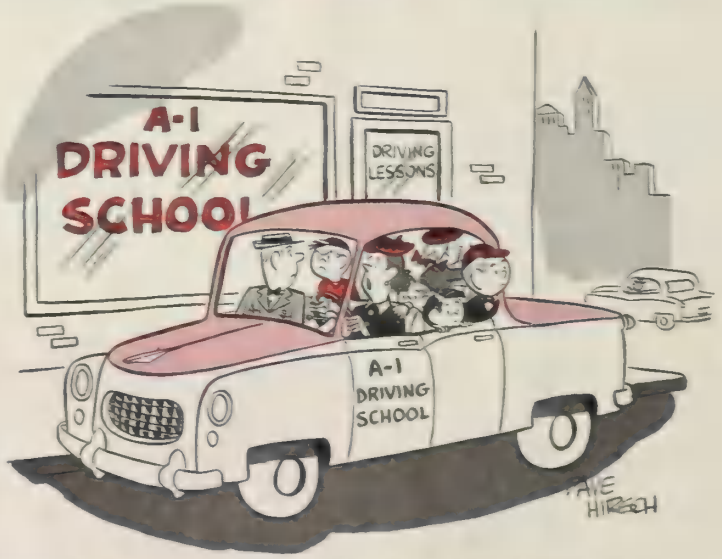
I heard the sound of a car coming down from the village and passing through the gateway. As it turned to the archway the headlights must have picked me up, for it stopped and Gaston got out. It was the Renault, and he came across the drive toward me. He looked flushed, a little awkward.

"I had not realized Monsieur le Comte was below," he said. "Forgive me, but it was raining hard, and I took Madame Yves and one or two other older people back to the verrerie. I did not ask permission. I did not want to disturb you."

"That's all right," I said. "I'm glad you took them home."

He came nearer and peered up at my face. "You look upset, Monsieur le Comte. Is anything wrong? Are you still feeling ill?"

"No," I told him. "It's just . . . a combination of circumstances." I gestured with my hand toward the château. It did not matter to me what he thought. I was not sure what I thought myself.



"Excuse me," he said, his manner diffident, yet somehow reassuring, gentle. "I don't wish to be indiscreet, but would Monsieur le Comte perhaps like me to drive him to Villars?"

I kept silent, not understanding.

"You have had a hard day, Monsieur le Comte," he went on. "At the château here everyone believes you to be in bed. If I drove you to Villars you could spend several hours there in comfort, without anxiety, and I could come back for you early in the morning. I only suggest it because at the present moment Monsieur le Comte cannot drive himself."

He glanced away from me, apologetic, tactful, and I knew that what he suggested was so profoundly the answer to my turmoil of mind and body and spirit that he expected no comment even, no word of affirmation. He went to the car and brought it back to the driveway below the terrace. He opened the door for me and I got in, and as he drove along the pitch-dark lanes to Villars, it seemed to me that there was nothing left now of that former self who had changed identity in the hotel bedroom at Le Mans. Every one of my actions, instincts, weaknesses, all had merged with those of Jean de Gué.

I thought for a moment it was the rain pouring from the gargoyle mouth, bearing away the silt and debris of the years, and the gargoyle himself, with flattened, evil ears, was cracking at the base, the stonework crumbling, so that he, too, would molder and soften with the flood. Then the horror of the dream departed and it was day, and the sound was Béla's bath water running. The darkness had gone and the rain with it, and the early morning sun was turning the rooftops gold.

I could hear her throwing open the shutters in the room across the passage, talking to the budgereegahs, putting their cages out on the balcony, their twittering chatter a variation of the running water. Presently I called to her and she came from the other room, dressed in wrapper and slippers.

"Did you sleep well?" she asked.

"Yes," I told her, and it was a delight to feel her arms and her shoulders bare under the loose flowing sleeves, and to be aware of skin smelling of apricots.

"I'll make you coffee directly," she said, "and as soon as Vincent comes I'll send him for croissants from the baker up the street. Your hand doesn't hurt you? Good. I'll dress it before you leave."

Then she was gone, and I gave myself up once more to lassitude and peace.

She had a quality of being surprised by nothing. Last night, when Gaston had deposited me outside the porte de ville and drove away, and I crossed the canal by the footbridge and tapped at the shuttered window, she had opened it instantly, without any startled query. Noticing at once my bandaged hand and general appearance of weariness and strain, she gestured to the deep chair where I had sat before and fetched me a drink. She did not ask one question, and it was I who broke the silence first by feeling in my pocket for the broken phial and tossing it into the wastepaper basket beyond the chair.

"Did I ever tell you my mother took morphine?" I asked her.

"No," she answered, "but I suspected it." Her voice was practical and cool, warning me that she accepted without praise or condemnation whatever Jean de Gué should choose to tell her, reserving her opinion for herself.

"Would it disgust you," I asked, "if you learned that I supplied her with morphine, bringing it with me from Paris as a gift, just as I brought you the bottle of Femme?"

"Nothing disgusts me, Jean," she said. "I know you too well to be repelled now by anything you choose to do."

She looked at me steadily. I leaned forward and took a cigarette from the box on the table beside me.

"This morning she came downstairs and went with us all to Mass," I said, "and then received about fifty guests on the terrace of the château. She looked magnificent. She did it, of course, from spite, to spoil Renée's day, who wanted to play hostess. This evening the little femme de chambre, Germaine, called me and I went up and found her"—I broke off, because it was vividly with me once again—"I found her wanting me to give her that." I looked at the wastepaper basket where I had thrown the empty phial.

"And you did so?"

"Yes."

She said nothing. She went on looking at me.

"That's why I've come to you," I said, "in self-pity and self-disgust."

"Those are things you must deal with in your own way," she said. "I can't act as a purge and rid you of them."

"You have before," I told her.

"Yes?"

Perhaps it was my imagination. Was her manner harder, more abrupt than it had been that afternoon two days ago? Or merely without interest, unmoved?

"I wonder how many times in the past," I said, "I've come here to this house, to you, knowing what was going on at home in the château, wanting to forget, and succeeding in forgetting because of what I found here?"

"If you don't remember," she said, "let it alone. It doesn't help the present. Anyway, you told me on Friday that your problems were likely to be easier in the future, that you were going to tackle them in a different way. Hasn't the new Jean de Gué been successful after all?"

Now she was smiling, and the faint mockery in her voice made me realize that she had no faith in him and never would have.

"He's failed," I said, "in precisely the same way that he's failed before. He gives his family what they ask for, through cowardice, through evasion, not only his mother but his daughter too. The only difference is that once it was done with gaiety and possibly charm. Now it's done with reluctance and distaste."

"That would be an advance," she said. "It depends on the point of view." And then the smile faded with the mockery in her voice. She came over to me, and took my hand and said, "So you didn't shoot today. Do you want me to do anything about this? I hear you burned yourself."

"Who told you?" I asked.

"One of the chasseurs."

She went out of the room, and came back with new dressings, as efficient as Blanche had been, and as she knelt beside me and dressed my hand I said, "I burned myself on purpose. I did not want to shoot."

"Why?" she said. "Were you afraid of shooting badly?"

The truth, coming from her, was such a shock that I did not answer. I waited for her to finish tying the bandage and then withdrew my hand, discomfited.

LINES TO ELIZABETH

By JEAN GUNTERT

When Elizabeth fell in love,
Pale hands penned a sonnet.
But I kiss a tear-wet chin and Put a plaster on it.

Immortal lines on love are hers.
My lines are hung with diapers.

As she rose to her feet she tapped my shoulder in a gesture half mocking, half affectionate. "Go on," she said, "sit back and finish your cigarette. I understand you had more to drink than to eat at midday, so possibly you can manage an omelet now."

She must know, then, about the speech as well, the lack of applause, the melting away of the guests. Disgrace was well established.

I followed her through to the small kitchen and watched her prepare the omelet. "At any rate," I said to her, "I broke my rule, and did not minister to the greed of the guests—on this occasion the greed for flattery and the meaningless banalities one gets on these occasions. I was only trying to be honest. I had no idea it would upset them so much."

"The truth is always embarrassing," she said, "even in the confessional. You of all people might have learned that by now. At a picnic lunch it happens to be misplaced."

"I can't help it," I went on, "if my truth happened to be theirs as well. I only told them that if I had a gun some of them might not have been alive by the end of the day."

She was busy beating the eggs with a fork. "Coming from a onetime Resistance leader," she said, "to a group of well-known collaborators, it must have sounded curious."

I stared at her blankly. "But that's not what I meant," I said. "That's not what I meant at all."

"That's what they understood," she said, and the laughter behind her eyes was the same as the twitch at the corner of Gaston's mouth. She neither applauded nor condemned.

She poured the eggs into the pan. "If your new-found sense of responsibility wants to get things straight," she said, "surely there's only one person who can do that for you—your sister Blanche."

She stared at me a moment, and then turned to the omelet. And the years that were gone, that I had no business to intrude upon, seemed merged into a single entity, like the eggs and the butter and the herbs. They could never be separated now, or examined one by one. I was responsible for the present, not the past.

She had the omelet on a plate, and the plate on a tray, and the tray in an instant on the table beside the chair in the small salon.

"So this new Jean," she said, "is not possessed by his family any more?"

"He never was."

"That's where you're wrong," she said. "The bond isn't easily broken. Wait till tomorrow."

And tomorrow had already come. As I drank my coffee, dressed and ready to depart, I saw that Gaston, faithful to his word, was sitting in the car outside the porte de ville.

The journey to St. Gilles was as silent as the outward one, except for his brief word of assurance that all in the château believed me to be in my room. "I let it be known," he said, his eyes straight on the road ahead of him, "that Monsieur le Comte did not wish to be disturbed. I even took the liberty of locking both doors into the dressing room." He handed me the keys.

"Thank you, Gaston," I said.

We were coming out of the line of trees and approaching the valley. Below us were the village, the river and the bridge.

"How many times, Gaston," I asked, "have you pulled me out of a scrape of my own making?"

He swerved left to the lime avenue, disclosing at the farther end of it the still-shuttered façade of St. Gilles.

"I have never counted, monsieur," he said. "It is just something I look upon as part of my duty to Monsieur le Comte, and to his family also."

He did not take the car through the gateway and onto the drive, but circled the enclosing walls of the moat and so through to the garage outbuildings by a side approach.

I crossed the terrace and went into the dark, cold hall. I crept up to the first floor and along the corridor to the dressing room, and turned the key in the lock. As I opened the door I stepped on a piece of paper that had been thrust underneath it. It was pink, with a sprig of flowers in one corner, the kind of paper given to children on birthdays or at Christmas. It said, in round, unformed letters:

"My papa, you told me you would not go away, and I believe you. But you never came to say good night, and your door is locked. The Sainte Vierge tells me you are suffering now for what wrong you did in the past, so I am going to pray that all your sins may be visited upon me, who, being young and strong, can bear them better. Sleep well, and have faith in Marie-Noël, who loves you dearly."

I put the paper in my pocket and sat down in a chair by the open window. I wished now that I had never left the château, never had those hours of release in Villars.

I went on sitting by the window, waiting for the customary time when Gaston would bring my tray. It must have been a little before eight when I heard the hurrying footsteps along the corridor, the knocking on the bedroom door—Françoise's, not mine—and the confused babble of voices, exclamations, cries. Then, on the bathroom door, which I had not yet unlocked, there came a sudden knocking and the voice of Françoise, urgent, shrill, "Jean, Jean, are you awake?"

I leaped from my chair and opened the door. She was standing there in her nightgown, wan and pale, and behind her Germaine, and beyond, in the bedroom, the gaunt, accusing figure of Blanche.

I put out my hand to steady Françoise. "It's all right," I said. "You don't have to tell me. It's maman, isn't it?"

Her eyes swept me, incredulous. "Maman?" she said. "Of course not. It's the child. She's disappeared. Germaine has just been to call her, and the bed hasn't been slept in. She never even undressed. If she hasn't been with you, then she's nowhere in the château—she's vanished, gone."

Their faces were turned to mine. I could see Paul, half dressed, at the bedroom door with Renée beside him. Françoise, shivering without a wrapper, was my first concern.

"Get back into bed," I said; "we'll soon find her."

Blanche led her, crying, protesting, back to bed.

"She's probably in the park, or in the woods," I said. "It's not so unusual for a child to get up early. Who was the last to see her? What time did she go to bed?"

"She was with Blanche," said Françoise. "Blanche was reading to her, weren't you, Blanche? She sent her to bed about half past nine."

I glanced at Blanche. Her face was set and strained. She did not look at me. "It's always the same," she said to Françoise. "Her father upsets her, works on her feelings, and she is capable of any foolishness after that."

"But Marie-Noël didn't see Jean all evening!" interrupted Renée. "Jean was asleep in his room."

Françoise, with swimming eyes, turned to me. "Did you drink so much?" she said. "What in the world will people think?"

Germaine, goggle-eyed, watched us from her corner.

"Go and tell Gaston to start searching the grounds," I said to her. "Tell him to get hold of Joseph, and anyone else who's about. Monsieur Paul and I will be down directly."

"If you want to know what I think," said Paul, "the child has run away because Jean made an exhibition of himself in public. She was ashamed. So were we all."

"Marie-Noël was not ashamed," said Renée. "I heard her telling everyone that Jean was the most courageous man in the world and nobody but herself knew why."

"Courageous? What did she mean by courageous?" asked Françoise.

"It did take courage of a sort," said Paul, "deliberately to wreck the day for those who had taken infinite time and trouble to try and make it a success. It was a curious thing that, out of about fifty people invited here after the shoot was over, only twenty or so turned up. It's not the personal slight I mind, but the slight on the family."

The bickering was interrupted by a knock on the door. We all turned, in hope and expectation, but it was only Charlotte.

"Excuse me, Monsieur le Comte, and you, too, Madame Jean," she said. "I have just heard about the child. I think I was the last to see her. When I went upstairs last night she was kneeling outside the dressing-room door. She wanted to say bon soir to her papa. She could not make you hear, Monsieur le Comte."

"That's not surprising," said Paul.

"Why didn't she try my door, then?" asked Françoise. "I was not asleep."

"That was my fault, Madame Jean," said Charlotte. "I told the child on no account to disturb her papa, or to disturb you, madame, who need sleep so badly with the little one soon to be born. A little playmate, I told her, sent from paradise, whom she must learn to love and cherish."

The small button eyes flickered toward me and fell. She looked from one to the other of us with a half-smile, servile, obsequious, upon her pinched mauve lips.

"Well," I asked, "what happened next?"

"She seemed a little upset, Monsieur le Comte. She said, 'My papa needs me, and nobody else.' Then she came with me as far as the service door, and on to her own staircase, and I went above to Madame la Comtesse. Is it possible, mademoiselle," suggested Charlotte, turning to Blanche, "that the little one has run down to the church? After all"—she hesitated, watching me—"if she has anything on her mind of which she is ashamed, she would surely go to Monsieur le Curé and ask to make her confession?"

"No," said Blanche, "she would come first to me."

Paul shrugged his shoulders. "It would be more to the point if we all got dressed, wouldn't it?" he asked. "Blanche can go down to the curé, and Jean and I search the grounds with Gaston. That is," he added, throwing me a glance, "if you're sufficiently recovered from yesterday."

Without answering, I turned and went back into the dressing room and, crossing to the window, looked down into the moat. There was nothing in it but the tangled grass, the ivy and the weeds. It was only in imagination that I saw the small body in the blue dress lying in the ditch, broken and useless.

It was Gaston who came to tell me that the dog was missing. Joseph had gone to feed him, and had found the kennel empty. This news brought an odd sense of relief. If Marie-Noël had taken César with her, he would act as protector, at least from this world's dangers. Nor would a child bent on self-destruction take a dog with her.

Once outside the château, Paul and the men and I divided the ground to be searched, and my territory took me toward the scene of yesterday's encounter with the marquis. The woods were soggy with the rain of the day and the night, the fallen leaves like paper under my feet, the brushwood soft and rotten.

I knew, tramping the long rides, climbing the ditches in the wood, that she would not be there. It was only an exercise I set myself because there was nowhere else to search, and the shouts and the halloos of the rest of them, closer to the château grounds, could not reach me here, with their irritating, useless frequency. If the child wanted to be found, she would be found, not there, not here, but waiting, hidden, before her own symbolic shrine.

When I broke finally from the forest and emerged into fields once more, I saw that my walk had brought me in a half circle. There, a couple of fields away, were the foundry sheds, half obscured by a fence enclosing their plot of ground, and the chimney itself, a pencil against the sky.

I climbed under the wire surrounding the wood, crossed the fields and, opening a small gate, came to the apple orchard behind the master's house. The windows, facing west, were blank and dim, but the tangled garden glistened like the raindrops in the wood. The house slept, yet was not desolate. The creeping vine protected the windows and the walls, and the teeming garden and orchard seemed an echo and a promise from a past still unfulfilled—a past that became suddenly blended with the present because of a half-open window. As I watched, I saw someone come to the window and look out at me and I walked over the wet earth and the fallen apples. When I stood beside the window I saw the figure was Julie, and she had her finger to her lips for silence.

"You came quickly," she whispered. "I only sent word to the château ten minutes ago. I could get no reply by telephone."

Her words had no meaning for me. Yet I was afraid. "I had no message," I said. "I came by chance."

I climbed through the window into the room. It was the same that I had entered Friday morning, where the furniture was stored, the onetime salon of the master's house. A shaft of sunlight fell upon the child, white and still under a heap of blankets, and upon the dog, his muzzle between his paws, stretched at her feet. It was what my fancy had conjured, yet, strangely, more poignant still. Not dripping from a pool, not torn or mangled, merely alone, a speck in isolation.

"One of the workmen found her because of César," said Julie. "The dog was standing guard beside the well. She must have climbed down the ladder to the bottom and lain there, amongst the glass and rubble, all the night. She was asleep when he brought her up, and she was sleeping still when he carried her into the house and called to me."

Asleep. I had thought her dead. I turned to Julie, but the wrinkled face was puzzled and awed, not stricken. Still whispering, she said, "It was Madame la Comtesse who walked in her sleep in old days. It is perhaps part of the little one's inheritance, Monsieur Jean. No doubt she had something on her mind."

I felt in my pocket for the scrap of paper. It belonged to Jean de Gué, yet it was also mine.

The Picture of Health for February

by MAXINE DAVIS

If you are one of the millions of us who can't even dream of a February holiday you slog along, low in spirits, low in energy, burdened with overshoes and heavy coats, and all the worries of the bottom of winter.

It's not the gloomy weather alone that gets you down. You don't get out-ors much. You eat too many starches and desserts and not ough really fresh vegetables and fruits.

SO—I'll tell you something I've discovered: you can get a cation feeling of bounce and well-being with vitamins. Good ulti-vitamins won't give you an out-of-season tan but if you ed them and add them to your foods, they can make you wake each morning thinking, "What a lovely day!"

BEXEL vitamin-mineral capsules are the best I've found cause they supply the nutritional elements that make the fference between feeling just so-so, and feeling really well.

BEXEL is a first-class ticket to sunshine in the household you provide it for the entire family as part of breakfast. nirteen-year-old Pete can have a grown-up capsule just like s Dad's. The twins can have gay red ones, child-sized, there-re lower-priced; or else have it in a pleasant-tasting syrup nich they can take any way they like—in their milk or even read on their toast. The baby gets hers in her formula.

With BEXEL watching over the family's health it's much sier to deal with transient troubles. For instance:—

Teen-agers are tense about mid-term examinations. They also dulge more than usual in those super-colossal concoctions of e cream on bananas covered with an ominous fall-out of nuts, ocolate goo, and what not! Result:—their skins break out th pimples or acne, and their morale breaks down.

There is no one treatment for acne but if you can do some-ing constructive about it, that helps its victims stop worrying. nat's one reason why UTOL gets results. It's an ointment, imarily antiseptic and antibiotic (tyrothricin). Equally im-rtant, it helps relieve minor irritation and itching. As it's a eam, I suggest UTOL as a foundation for make-up for girls; ey can do their faces, look pretty, and stop brooding. Boys n apply it, and forget it. Then the whole condition improves.

We face other difficulties that come with snow and sleet:—our husband has a rough irritated throat on the very orning he's to have a conference for which he's been preparing r weeks. "I'm coming down with something. I won't get out ree words," he croaks morosely. "The whole program will 'll through."

While he's still regarding his tie as if it were a bunch of es on his chest, you bring him his orange juice and a con-iner of NEO-AQUA-DRIN lozenges.

You can tell he's not sick. If you suspected something ious such as a strep throat you'd call the doctor. Under essure he always sits, as he did last night, chain-smoking in s stuffy den, rechecking details until the small hours, and en opens both bedroom windows wide to let in the clear—d damp bitter—air. His resulting hoarse throat is no surprise.

It's a common complaint due to these or similar causes. O-AQUA-DRIN'S soothing local anesthetic action takes care of and its additional antibiotic guards against secondary infec-n. Thanks to NEO-AQUA-DRIN he'll be OK.

You know everything was a success because he bursts in that ening and gives newly arrived Aunt Amy—not his favorite ative—an exuberant hug.

She moans, pulls away. She's driven with the car window en and now she's suffering agony from her arthritic shoulder.

"I've got just the thing for you," your husband offers nfidently. "It's SURIN. You put a moist warm towel where ur shoulder aches and then when the area is warm massage e ointment in. It's not a cure for your arthritis; there isn't y. But SURIN gets right to the spot and alleviates the pain."

You keep it on hand because it provides hospital-tested ief for the misery of such afflictions as rheumatism, arthritis, sore aching muscles. You get it for Aunt Amy while your sband is saying:

"Try it, and then doll up. This is a big night. With SURIN u'll be able to enjoy the celebration."

"In my lodge by the gates," she answered. "I saw nothing. I heard everything. It was not my business then, or now."

Her hand was still on my shoulder as we heard a lorry turn into the gates of the verrerie.

"Julie," I asked, "did you like Maurice Duval?"

"We all liked him," she said. "No one could help it. He had all the qualities you lacked. That was why Monsieur le Comte your father made Maurice Duval master of the verrerie. I'm sorry, Monsieur Jean, but it's true."

I could hear footsteps coming toward the house, and voices too. Julie turned her head.

"They've got my message," she said. "Someone has come from the château. Perhaps you can carry the child to the car and back to her bed, and she will never know that she walked here to the verrerie in her sleep."

"She didn't walk in her sleep," I said. "She came deliberately."

My lie to Marie-Noël about my burned hand, my behavior at the shoot, my evasion of the preceding night had all combined to make her think her father penitent. She had atoned for his deed in her own way, by acting the part of the victim. Only by doing this could she bring him absolution. I felt for the letter in my pocket and read it once again. It wasn't a scrap of paper after all: it was a testament of faith.

Someone was entering the house by the office: Julie went to the door, her fingers raised to her lips for silence.

"Quietly," she whispered. "The child is still asleep."

I thought it would be Gaston or Paul. It was neither. It was Blanche. She went straight to Marie-Noël and knelt beside her, gently turning the blanket, and I saw that the child had on a coat over her blue frock, and thick stockings and shoes that she had not worn the night before. To have dressed herself thus sleep was surely impossible. The garmen were marked with lime and dust, and torn several places.

Blanche, still kneeling, turned to Juli "Where did you find her?"

Julie, for the first time strained, nonpluse threw me a questioning glance as though doubt for an answer.

"It was Ernest who discovered her, mad moiselle," she said, "here, inside the hous Didn't he tell you?"

"He told me inside a shed," she answere "but the sheds are always locked at nigh She has been lying amongst broken gla and lime."

Inside the house or inside the shed, bo were lies. Why did Ernest and Julie lie Blanche? Julie had not lied to me.

"Her pockets are full of glass," said Blanch "Did you know that?"

Julie did not answer. Once again she look at me as if for help, and Blanche, feeling the child's coat pocket, drew out a handful minuscule objects: a jug no larger than thumbnail, a vase, a flacon, all miniature perfectly formed, and among them a repli of the château of St. Gilles, diminutive yet u mistakable, two towers smashed.

"These have not been made since befo the war," said Blanche. "I ought to kno since I helped design them."

For the first time she looked about the roo and away from the child—at the tables a the chairs and the bookshelves and the trunk all of them stored there. And in a flash comprehension I realized that what she w looking at had once been part of her life. Th dusty salon in the master's house was to ha been a place possessed by two people w loved each other well, both faithful to the pa and to tradition, both looking to a future th might, when war was finished, prove stab and secure. But something had gone amis sorrow had turned inward, the cross she kne before in her bedroom was not a Saviour bu her own hope crucified.

On impulse, I took the letter out of m pocket and gave it to her. As she read it, knew that what had happened on a dark nig nearly fifteen years ago had not come abou by chance, but was something planned an done deliberately by a man without heart feeling.

"The little one has blood on her hands," said Julie suddenly. "I did not notice it whe I covered her with the blankets."

Blanche gave me back the letter without word, and together we knelt beside the chil Taking the small clenched fists, Blanch opened one hand and I the other. In the ho low of each palm was the red weal of a recen cut, but the cut now dry, not bleeding. Th hands were clean—there was no dust, n glass. I said nothing, nor did Blanche. The slowly she raised her eyes.

"Julie," she said, "I want you to te Jacques to telephone to Monsieur le Curé an ask him to come here at once. Then look the directory for the number of the conver of the Sacré-Coeur at Lauray, and find out it would be possible for the mother superi to speak to Mademoiselle de Gué."

Julie, bewildered, looked from Blanch to me.

"Are you mad?" I said to Blanche. "Don you realize she did it on purpose, that she di it for me, because I burned my hand i the fire?"

"Julie," said Blanche, "do what I tell you."

I went and stood by the door, my back against it. Julie, distressed, looked fron Blanche to me. "There is no need for Mon sieur le Curé," she said. "The child has no come to any harm. She has only cut hersel with glass. It is full of glass at the bottom o the well."

"The well?" said Blanche. "She climbe into the well?"

Julie realized her mistake too late. "Why yes, mademoiselle," she said. "What if she did climb into the well and lie there in th depths of it all night? It has been dry fo fifteen years. What if she walked here to th verrerie asleep or awake, for both your sakes or for her own, poor little one, because she has too much imagination? Why doesn'

Blanche turned white. Emotion, long con-olled, fought for release. "How dare you aspheme, how dare you?" she said, her oice outraged, passionate. "I've watched er the child since she was born. I've loved r, trained her, brought her up as if she were y own, because her mother was a fool and r father a devil. I won't let her suffer in this orld as I have suffered."

The tenderness had gone, the pathos too. he Blanche who had come looking for the st child was another woman, fanatical, bit-r, seeking a victim in the one she wished save.

"The Seigneur does not act in that way, ademoiselle," said Julie. "If He wants to ll the child to Himself, He will do so in His vn good time, and not because Monsieur le omte killed the man you loved. The little one ill suffer in this world only because of what ou do to her; yes, you, and her father, and r grandmother, and everybody up at the hâteau. Now, look—you have woken her o, the damage is done."

Yet it was Julie herself whose voice, loud nd indignant, had caused César to bark and e bark to startle the child. Marie-Noël, her es suddenly open and alive with curiosity, ared at us from the heap of blankets. She t up instantly. "I've had the most atrocious ream," she said.

Blanche bent over her at once, her arms und her in protection. "It's all right, my érie," she said. "You're safe, you're with e. I'm going to take you where they will nderstand you and look after you. It will ver happen again, the horror and the fear the well."

Marie-Noël looked at her calmly. "It was ot horrible, nor was I frightened," she re-ied. "Germaine said it was haunted, but I ver saw a ghost. The verrerie is a happy ace. It's the château that is full of ghosts."

César, reassured by the sound of her voice, settled himself at her feet. Marie-Noël patted his head. "He's hungry, and so am I. Can we go across to the cottage with Madame Yves and get some bread?"

The telephone started ringing from the office. Julie moved automatically to the door. I opened it, and Blanche rose slowly to her feet. Faced with the living present, the three of us acted instinctively. Only the child looked troubled.

"I hope that's not the beginning of it," she said.

"The beginning of what?" I asked.

"The beginning of my ferocious dream," she said, and pushing aside the blankets, she stood up. "The Sainte Vierge is anxious about all of us," she said. "She told me gran'mie wanted maman to die. In the dream I wanted her to die too. So did you. We were all guilty. It was very wicked. Isn't there something you can do to prevent it coming true?"

Jacques must have gone into the office, for the ringing ceased, and through the open door I heard his low voice speaking. Julie passed me and went to the kitchen, and after a moment Jacques' voice ceased, and then Julie reappeared. I left Marie-Noël and went to her.

"It was Charlotte asking for Monsieur Paul," she said. "I told her you were here with Mademoiselle Blanche. She said would you both go back at once to the château. There has been an accident. She said not to take the child."

Blanche said never a word to me, nor I to her, as the workman called Ernest drove us back in the lorry; the evil that encompassed us both was like a cloud impossible to penetrate.

The château was deserted. Everyone was out, still searching for the child. Only Charlotte was left, babbling and hysterical, the woman who milked the cows, and the cook, whom I had never seen before but whom I knew to be Gaston's wife. As we entered the château she came from the kitchen and said, "They brought the ambulance from Villars. I did not know where else to telephone."

The woman who milked the cows turned first to me and then to Blanche, and her voice, unintelligible and shrill, repeated again and again the only words I understood, "I saw her fall . . . I saw her fall." The upturned eyes, the sudden sweeping gesture of her hand as she mimed the falling body, was terrible and vivid, the drama of a witch, and Charlotte, plucking at Blanche's sleeve and babbling, "She was still breathing, mademoiselle, I put a mirror to her lips," became her partner in the dreadful play.

The nightmare ride began again. Out of the drive, through the gateway, up the avenue and onto the road to Villars, in the wake of the ambulance that could have preceded us by only some twenty-five minutes.

Things seem to be going fairly well, now that a spirit of pessimism prevails in all the departments.

Villars was full of dust and noise. Men were drilling a side road, cars were parked one behind the other, and the hospital building, which I had not noticed when Marie-Noël and I had walked the market place, now seemed prominent and large and ugly because of my own fears.

It was Blanche who entered first, Blanche who spoke rapidly to someone white-coated, young, standing in the passage, and Blanche who pushed me into the waiting room while she disappeared through a door beyond. The sister who returned with her was calm, impassive.

"I can't tell you the extent of the injuries. The doctor is examining her now," she said as she led us from the waiting room to a smaller private one.

Blanche did not sit down, although the sister drew forward a chair. She went and stood by the window, with her back to me. I think she was praying. Her head was bent, her hands clasped in front of her. I stared at a map of the region that was framed on the wall.

"Monsieur le Comte?" The man who entered, big, burly, would surely have given confidence to a waiting relative, but I had seen too many doctors' expressions in the war not to recognize finality. "I am Doctor Moutier. I want to tell you that everything we can possibly do is being done. The injuries are extensive, and it would be wrong of me to express any great hope. The comtesse is, of course, unconscious. I understand neither of you was present when the accident occurred."

Once again Blanche was the spokesman and the useless story repeated. "The windows are large," said Blanche. "She had been unwell. She must have gone to the window, feeling faint, and opened it too wide, and leaning out ——" She did not finish the sentence.

The doctor's brief "Naturally, naturally" was mechanical. He added, "The comtesse was dressed. She was not in night clothes. Presumably she was going to join you in the search for the child."

I glanced at Blanche, but her eyes were fixed on the doctor. "She was not dressed when the rest of us left the château. She was in bed. None of us dreamed for a moment that she would get up."

"Mademoiselle, it is always the unforeseen that produces accidents. Excuse me." He turned to speak to the sister outside the door. The low, rapid conversation was inaudible to us inside the room, but I thought I caught the words "transfusion" and "Le Mans," and I could see from Blanche's face that she had heard them too.

"They are going to give a transfusion," she said. "I heard him say they were sending the blood from Le Mans."

She was watching the door, and I wondered if she realized that these were the first words she had spoken to her brother for fifteen years.

They came too late. He was not there to hear them.

The doctor turned to us again. "You will excuse me, monsieur, and you, mademoiselle. I will let you know as soon as there is anything definite to tell you."

Blanche caught at his sleeve. "Forgive me, doctor. I could not help overhearing something of what you were saying to the sister. You have sent to Le Mans for blood?"

"Yes, mademoiselle."

"Are you sure it wouldn't save time if my brother gave his blood? Both he and my brother Paul belong to blood-group O, which I understand can be given to anyone without danger."

For a moment the doctor hesitated, glancing at me. Appalled at what might happen, at the inevitable worsening of disaster, I said swiftly, "I'm not a universal-donor O. I only wish to God I were."

Blanche looked at me, dumfounded. "That's not true. You are both universal donors, you and Paul. I remember Paul telling me only a few months ago."

I shook my head. "No," I said, "you're mistaken. Paul, perhaps, not me. I belong to group A."

The doctor gestured. "Please don't distress yourselves," he said. "It is preferable to use the blood straight from the laboratory. There will be very little delay. Everything necessary is on its way now to Villars from Le Mans." He went out of the room.

For a few moments Blanche s nothing. Then oddly, terribly, seemed to me, her expression of c cern and anguish changed. Slowly, though she could not believe her o words, she said, "You don't want save her. You're hoping she will di

"Ah, no," he said, "it was here in half an hour. We gave the transfusion at once. Everything that it was possible to do was done. Your wife did not die from any sort of neglect, Monsieur le Comte, please believe me. But alas, our efforts were in vain. We could not save her."

The sister said, "You would like to see her," her words a plain statement of fact, not an interrogation, and she led me down the passage and into a small room. We stood together beside the bed, looking down on Françoise de Gué. There was no sign of injury. She might have been sleeping. She did not look like a person dead.

The sister said, "I always think the real personality appears on the face during the first hour after death. Sometimes it is a consolation to believe this."

I was not sure. The Françoise lying dead looked peaceful, younger, happier than the Françoise who had hammered on the dressing-room door that morning. The Françoise of the morning had been haggard, anxious, querulous; if this, the dead one, was true and the other false, then living had accomplished nothing; it had been a waste of time.

"It is very hard for you to have lost them both," said the sister.

Both? I thought for one moment that she meant Marie-Noël, that she had heard the story of the missing child. Then I remembered.

"There's a daughter," I said, "eleven years old."

"Doctor Moutier told me you would have had a son," she went on.

She withdrew to the door and stood there, her eyes lowered, believing, I supposed, that I wanted to be alone, to pray. I did not pray, but I tried to think if I had said anything to Françoise in the week that had been deliberately unkind. I could not remember. I was glad I had given her the miniature my first evening. She had been happy then, and pleased. There was nothing else, unless it was waiting on her on Thursday night. I wished I had done more. I turned and went back to the others.

Paul said to me, "You had better get home to St. Gilles. I've telephoned to Gaston to bring the Citroën. Blanche and I will stay here to make arrangements, and Gaston can drive you and Renée in the Renault."

I could tell, by their faces, that they had been discussing what must be done. There was a certain quiet formality of tone and gesture that went with the aftermath of death.

When Gaston came I sensed relief. They wanted me out of the way. Renée silently pushed me into the front seat, herself got into the back, and we drove away.

Gaston's face was shocked and drawn. He had not said anything to me when I had climbed into the car, but silently, gently he had put a rug over my knees, a touching gesture of sympathy for sorrow. I wondered, as he took the familiar road again, whether he thought, as I did, of the morning's drive and that of the preceding night, hours so remote that they seemed never to have happened.

The closed shutters of the château were the first sign of mourning, and I supposed that Gaston had given orders for this to be done.

Gaston had also given orders for a meal to be laid in the dining room, for none of us had touched any food. More to satisfy him, I think, than ourselves, we sat down and ate mechanically.

Renée, subdued and gentle, revealing another facet of herself, told me how she and Paul had driven to every farm during the morning within a radius of ten kilometers, inquiring for the child, and had only returned to St. Gilles at half past twelve. It was strange, I thought, how sudden death, like war, brings instant sympathy. The challenging, sensual Renée of the past week was now natural, kindly, anxious to help us all.

Presently she went upstairs and I continued sitting in the dining room, thinking. After a while I got up and went to the desk in the library. I found a piece of paper and a pen and wrote to Julie, telling her Françoise was dead and that I wanted her to break the news to Marie-Noël. I asked her to keep the child with her until the evening. Then I called Gaston and gave him the letter to take to the verrerie.

"Monsieur le Curé is upstairs with Madame la Comtesse," he said after a moment's hesitation. "Does Monsieur le Comte wish to see him now, or presently?"

"How long has he been here?" I asked.

"Madame la Comtesse sent for him as soon as Charlotte told her of the accident."

"When was that?"

"I don't know, Monsieur le Comte. Monsieur Paul and I could get no sense out of any of the women here when we returned and heard what had happened. They were too upset to explain anything clearly."

"I'll see Monsieur le Curé directly," I said. "Meanwhile ask Germaine to come to me."

"Very good, Monsieur le Comte."

Germaine was in tears as she entered the room, and at sight of me her face crumpled afresh. It was a moment or two before she could control herself.

"That's enough," I said. "You only make it harder for all of us if you give way. There is something I want to ask you. Did you know Madame Jean had got up and dressed this morning before the accident?"

"No, Monsieur le Comte. I took her breakfast at nine, and she was still in bed. She said nothing to me about getting up. Mademoiselle Blanche sent me to make inquiries in the village about the child, and when I came back I went straight to the kitchen. I never saw Madame Jean again."

The tears were welling into her eyes once more, and I had nothing else to ask her. I told her to send Charlotte to me.

It was a moment or two before Charlotte appeared, and when she did I saw at once that the hysteria of the morning was now over. She was watchful, self-possessed. I did not waste any time. I said, "When we all went out this morning to look for the child, did you go back to talk to Madame Jean?"

There was a momentary hesitation and then she said, "Yes, Monsieur le Comte. I just ipped in to say a word or two of comfort hile she was having breakfast."

"What did you say to her?"

"There was nothing much I could say, Monsieur le Comte. She was worried that the hild might have turned against her. 'She is oo fond of her papa,' she said, 'and of Mademoiselle Blanche; she does not come to er mother as she should.' Those were her xact words."

"How did you answer that?"

"I told her the truth, Monsieur le Comte. I aid that when a father idolizes his daughter s Monsieur le Comte idolizes Marie-Noël, is always difficult for the mother. I had an unt who experienced the same trouble."

"Did you tell her that by way of comfort?"

"I told her because I was sympathetic, Monsieur le Comte. I knew that Madame ean was often lonely."

I wondered just how much damage Charotte had done, now and in the past, in the hâteau of St. Gilles. "Did you know Madame ean meant to get up?" I asked.

Again the flicker of hesitation. "She said othing definite," Charlotte answered. "She old me she did not like staying there all alone, ot knowing what was happening. She asked Madame la Comtesse was awake upstairs. said not yet. She said she might have some deas about the child. Then I took her tray nd went downstairs. That was the last time saw Madame Jean." She shook her head lowly as she said this, and sighed, but there vas nothing genuine about the gesture, like he flowing tears of Germaine.

"At what time did Madame la Comtesse vake?" I said.

Charlotte thought or a moment. "I'm ot sure, Monsieur le Comte. I think it was bout ten. She rang or me, but she did ot want anything to at. I told her about he child. She just hrugged her shoulders; she wasn't interested. She sat in her hair, and I made her ed, and presently, eeing that she did ot need me, I went elow again."

She lowered her eyes and her voice and bent er head. I told her curtly she could go, and s she was leaving the room I said, "When ou broke the news of the accident to Madame a Comtesse, what did she say?"

Charlotte paused, her hand on the door. She was horrified, Monsieur le Comte, tunned. Because of that I sent at once for Monsieur le Curé. I could not give her anyhing; it would not have been wise. You nderstand me?"

"I understand you."

When she had gone, I went upstairs to the dressing room and through the bathroom to he bedroom. Someone had closed the shutters here as elsewhere, and the window too. The bed had not been made, only the sheet nd blankets pulled back. I went to the window and opened it, and the shutters too. The base of the window came to my hip. It was possible to sit on the sill, lean out and lean oo far. Possible, but not probable. Yet it had happened. I closed the window and the shutters once again. I looked around the bedroom hat gave no clue to what had passed, and hen went out and shut the door behind me. I walked along the corridor, up the stairs, nd so to the room in the tower at the ar end.

I did not knock. I opened the door and went straight in. The dogs had been banished, nd the only sound was the low murmur of he curé, praying, and the echoing response rom the opposite chair. Both had their rosaries n their hands; the curé was kneeling, head bowed, the mother sat huddled in her chair, shoulders hunched, chin touching her chest.

I did not kneel—I listened and waited. The murmur of the curé ran on, monotonous, soothing, and my senses and my nerves, which had been strained, ready to snap, became gradually numbed, tuning themselves to the atmosphere and tempo of this room without life.

When the last Gloria was said, and the last amen, there was a pause before the world took charge once more. The curé, rising to his feet, came to me and took my hand.

"My son," he said, "we have been praying so hard for you, your mother and I, and we have asked that you may be given courage and support in this terrible moment of affliction."

I thanked him, and he continued standing, holding my hand and patting it, his face troubled for my sake, yet serene.

"The child," he said; "would you like me to tell her?"

I told him no, I had asked Julie to tell her, but that presently both Paul and Blanche would be home, and perhaps he would arrange with them the many things that must be done.

"You know," he said, "that now, tomorrow and always I am at your disposal, ready to do all in my power for you, and Madame la Comtesse and the child, and everyone at the château."

He blessed us both, took his books and left the room. We were alone. I said nothing. Nor did she. I did not look at her. Then suddenly, on impulse, I crossed to the window and pulled back the heavy curtains. I opened the windows wide and the shutters, too, flinging them back against the wall, and air came into the room, and light. Then I stood beside her chair, and the sun of late afternoon shone down on her so that nothing was hidden; neither the gray pallor of her face, nor the hooded eyes, nor the raddled cheeks. As she raised her hand to shield her eyes from the sun, the sleeve of her black wool coat fell back, showing the puncture marks between wrist and forearm.

"What are you doing? Are you trying to blind me?" she said. Her rosary fell to the floor, and her missal, too, and I picked them up and gave them back to her, and then stood between her and the sun.

"What happened?" I asked.

"Happened?" She repeated the question after me, raising her head and staring. "How do I know what happened, imprisoned here as I am, useless, nobody even answering a bell?" She paused a moment, then she added, "Close the shutters and draw the curtains. You know I hate the light."

"No," I said.

She grimaced, and shrugged her shoulders. "As you wish. It's a strange moment to open them, that's all. I gave orders for Gaston to close the château. I presume he has done what he was told." She settled herself back in her chair. "Now the curé has gone," she said, "I could tell Charlotte to bring back the dogs. Why do you keep standing? Why don't you draw up the chair and sit down?"

I did not sit down. I knelt on one knee beside her chair, my hand on the arm of it. She watched me, her face a mask.

"What did you say to her?" I asked.

"What did I say to whom?"

"To Françoise."

Nothing happened, except that she sat more still. Her left hand ceased to play with the fringe of her shawl.

"When?" she asked. "I did not see her after she became unwell and went to bed. I had not seen her for several days."

"You're lying," I said. "You saw her this morning."

My reply was sudden. I saw her whole body stiffen in her chair.

"Who says so?" she demanded. "Who's been talking?"

"I say so," I answered, "and nobody's been talking."

"Did she recover consciousness? Did she say anything to you in the hospital before she died?" The question was sharp, abrupt.

"No," I said. "She said nothing to me, or to anyone."

"Then what does it matter? Why do you want to know? Suppose she did come here this morning, how can it help you now?"

"I want to know how and why she died," I answered.

She gestured. "What's the use? None of us can know. She became giddy and fell. Berthe saw her, didn't she, as she was crossing into the park with the cows? That was what Charlotte told me. Weren't you told the same story?"

"Yes," I said, "I was told the same story I don't believe it, that's all."

"What do you believe?"

I stared at the face that told me nothing. "I believe she killed herself," I said, "and so do you."

I expected a denial, or an outburst. Instead, unbelievably, she shrugged her shoulders, and then she smiled and said indifferently, "And if she did ——"

This answer, cold, inhuman, struck at me with stunning force. For whatever reason—

Women are supposed to be very calm generally, but women feel just as men feel; they need exercise for their faculties and a field for their efforts as much as their brothers do; they suffer from too rigid a constraint, too absolute a stagnation, precisely as men would suffer; and it is narrow-minded in their more privileged fellow creatures to say that they ought to confine themselves to knitting stockings, playing the piano and embroidering bags.

jealousy, possessiveness, malice, greed—the mother had wanted Françoise's death; and she believed that her son had wanted it too. It roused no pity in her that Françoise, unhappy, ill, neglected, had perhaps given up the unequal battle to live. The birth of a son, or Françoise's death—either meant release from poverty; and her husband's mother felt only relief that matters had resolved themselves in the way that brought the greatest advantage to them all.

She leaned forward in her chair. "It's too late to develop a conscience," she said. "I told you that the other evening. And if you thought that Françoise would survive the birth of the child, what made you gamble on her death?"

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"The day after you returned from Paris you telephoned Carvalet," she said. "Charlotte told me—she listened on the extension in Blanche's room, as she always does if there's anything being said below worth listening to, and then reports to me. When I heard what you had said to the firm, the nonsensical agreement to their demands, I knew at once that it was a gamble. You were counting on the fortune that might come. No wonder you had qualms the next morning, and went off to Villars to the bank, and down to the safe to look through the marriage settlement. You could have spared yourself the trouble. There are duplicates of everything in the library, if you had only taken the trouble to search for them."

The pattern of events was plain and could not be denied. My motives, misconstrued and twisted, were unimportant now.

"Françoise knew about the contract," I said. "I didn't keep it from her. I told her the truth."

"The truth?" The eyes that looked into mine were cynical and hard. "We all of us tell the truth when it happens to suit us," she said. "Françoise told me the truth this morning, when she came in here. Oh yes, you're right. I did see her. I was probably the last to do so. She came up dressed, ready to search for the child. 'What's upset Marie-Noël?' she asked. 'Why has she run away?' 'What's upset her?' I answered. 'She's afraid of being supplanted, that's all. None of us like to be deposed. She wants you out of the way, and the baby too.'

"That started it. She told me she'd never been happy here and it was my fault because I'd been against her from the start. 'Jean was never in love with me,' she said. I agreed. 'Even now he only wants the money,' she went on. 'Naturally,' I replied. 'Does he want me to die so that he can marry someone else?' she asked at last. I told her I did not know. 'Jean makes love to everyone. He has made love to Renée, even, here in the château, and he has a mistress in Villars,' I said. She told me she had suspected both these things, and that your kindness to her the last few days had been a blind, to make her believe otherwise. 'So the child isn't the only one to want me out of the way,' she said. 'Jean does, too, and so do you, and Renée, and the woman at Villars.'

"I didn't answer her. I told her to stop being hysterical, and to take herself downstairs. That was all. She asked for the truth and got it. Whether she threw herself out of the window or fell because she was giddy is beside the point. The result is the same. You've got what you wanted, haven't you?"

"No," I shouted, "no!"

I pushed her back in the chair, and her expression changed. She looked bewildered, frightened, and the sudden switch from cynicism to apprehension at the sound of my voice, roused in anger against her, as she believed, and not against myself, made me realize the hopelessness of explanation. Whatever she had said to Françoise, however harsh, had been said for her son's sake. I could not accuse her.

I got up and went to the window, and stood there staring out across the park to the trees. Dear God, I thought, there must be an answer to this, there must be a way out—not for me, the impostor, but for them, for the mother, for the child, for Blanche and Paul and Renée. If Jean de Gué had fostered jealousy, dissension, animosity, he had the excuse of the past. I had no such pretext.

I turned away from the window, and looked back at the woman sitting in the chair. I said to her, "You've got to help me."

"Help you? How?" she asked.

I knelt beside her chair and took her hand. Whatever wrongs there had been in the years that were gone, they could not be righted by a stranger. I could only build the present. But not alone.

"You told me just now that I had got what I wanted," I said. "Did you mean the money? For the glass foundry, for all of us, for St. Gilles?"

"What else?" she asked. "You'll be a rich man; you can do what you like and you'll be free. That's all that matters to you, isn't it?"

"No," I said, "you matter to me. I want you to be the head of my house, as you used to be. And you can't as long as you take morphine."

Something fell apart, the layer upon layer of defense protecting every individual from assault so that no challenge can be heard, no signal seen. I felt, in the hand that tightened on mine, the loneliness of years, the numbed

AND SAY WE ARE NOT LOST

By BARBARA SHOOK

Let not our love winter-die;
Hopes that once sailed treetop high,
Turn back to April's looking glass,
And tell me that the cold will pass.

Turn back the clock to tender things,
Tendrils gently curled toward spring,
Fern fronds lacing through the frost,
And say, oh say, we are not lost!

senses, the mocking mind, the empty heart. Then she withdrew her hand.

"I'm tired and old and useless," she said. "Why should you grudge me something that makes me forget?"

"You're not tired or old or useless," I said. "To yourself, perhaps, but not to me. Yesterday you came downstairs and stood on the terrace, receiving the guests. You wanted to stand beside me, as you stood beside my father; you wanted to be the person you were once, long ago. But it was also an attempt to prove to yourself that it could be done, that you were not dependent on the box of ampoules in there, and the syringe, and Charlotte. You could defeat them, and you did. You would have gone on defeating them but for me."

She looked up at me, watchful, guarded. "What do you mean?"

"What did you think about," I asked, "yesterday morning, after all the guests had gone?"

"I thought about you," she said, "about the past. What does it matter what I thought? I began to suffer, that's all. When I suffer I have to have morphine."

"I made you suffer," I said. "I was the cause."

"What if you were?" she said. "All mothers suffer for their sons. We don't blame you for it."

"It's not part of a son's life," I said. "They can't stand pain. I'm a coward and always have been. That's why I want your help, now and in the future, much more so than in the past."

I rose and went into the dressing room ne door. The box of ampoules was still in t cupboard, and the syringe. I took them o and brought them into the bedroom a showed them to her.

"I'm going to take them away," I sa "Perhaps it's dangerous to do so—I do know. You told me I gambled on winning fortune when I made that new contract w Carvalet. This is another gamble, a differe kind."

I saw her hands tighten on the chair, a for a moment a look of terror, of despa came into her eyes.

"I can't do it, Jean," she said. "You do understand. I can't deprive myself sudden like this. It's too late."

"It's not too late." I put the box down the table. "Give me your hands," I said.

She put her hands in mine and I pulled h up from the chair. As she stood beside m she steadied herself, clutching my bandage hand, and I felt the searing pain shoot fro my fingers to my elbow, turning me sick. S went on holding me, not realizing, and I kne that if I took my hand away something wou be lost to her, some confidence, some strengt that for the moment was part of her and ga her courage.

"Now come downstairs," I said.

She stood between me and the windo massive, huge, trembling a moment as s gained her balance. "Downstairs?" she r peated. "What for?"

"Because I need you," I said. "And future you'll come down every day."

For a long time she held onto me, ne once relaxing her grip upon my hand. Th she released me and moved slowly to the do majestic, dignified. She did not take my a in the corridor but went forward, ahead me, and opened the door of another roo At once the terriers rushed at her, barkin jumping.

She turned to me, exultant. "Just as thought," she said. "These dogs are not take out. Charlotte lies to me. Charlotte is su posed to take them in the park every afte noon. The trouble is there is no supervision the château, no sort of order."

The dogs, released, ran to the stairs, an as we followed she said, "Did I hear you te the curé that Blanche and Paul were to mak the arrangements for the funeral?"

"Yes."

"They don't understand these things," sh said. "There hasn't been a funeral in th château since your father died. It must b done properly. Françoise was a person of im portance—she should have every respect pa to her. After all, she was your wife. She wa the Comtesse de Gué."

She waited at the head of the stairs while put the boxes in the dressing room. As w entered the salon we heard voices. Paul w standing by the fireplace, the curé beside hi Renée was in her usual place on the sof Blanche on another chair. They stared at u disconcerted, and even the curé, startled, can forward, solicitous. But she waved him asi and went straight to the chair beside the fir the chair where Françoise always sat. Blanch rose at once and went to her.

"You ought to be in bed," she said. "Cha lotte told me you were very shaken, ver exhausted."

"Charlotte's a liar," was the answer, "an you can mind your own business." She fum bled on her dress for the pair of spectacle that were hanging from a chain round he neck beside the crucifix. She put them on an looked at each one of us in turn. "This is house of mourning," she said, "not a nursin home. My daughter-in-law has died. I inten to see that everything is done to honor he that should be done. Paul, get me a pencil an some sheets of paper. Blanche, in the desk i my room, in the top drawer, you will find dossier containing all the names of the peopl who came to your father's funeral. Most o them are dead, but they have relatives. Renée fetch me the telephone directory from th cloakroom. Monsieur le Curé, I should b obliged if you will come and sit beside me; may have to refer to you for matters concern ing the actual burial itself. Jean"—she looke up at me, and paused—"I don't expect any help from you for the moment. You had better take a walk; the air will do you good. But before you go," she added, "change into a dark suit. The Comte de Gué does not stroll about in a sports jacket when he has lost his wife."

I left them in the salon, and I went upstairs and changed. Then I called for Gaston and asked him to bring the car round to the drive.

"I want you to take me to the verrerie," I said. "I'm going to fetch the child."

"Very good, Monsieur le Comte."

As we drove out of the village and up the hill toward the forest he said, "My wife and I, Monsieur le Comte, and indeed everyone in the château, wish to express our deepest sympathy to you in this moment of stress."

"Thank you, Gaston," I said.

"If there is anything any of us can do, you have only to say so, Monsieur le Comte."

I thanked him again. There was nothing anybody could do to ease things, except myself; and I had started off by depriving an addict of morphine, which might lead to a tragedy worse than the first. I did not know. All I knew was that I had become a gambler, like Jean de Gué.

Gaston stopped the car outside the foundry gates. No one was about. The men must have stopped work for the day out of respect for Françoise.

I got out of the car and went into the deserted grounds. Julie was not in her lodge. She must be in her son's cottage, and Marie-Noël with her. I told Gaston to wait, and walked toward the master's house, but the door was locked. I crossed the worn paving in front of the windows, and went and looked down into the well. I suppose it was about twenty feet in depth. The rickety ladder, with gaps here and there where the rungs were missing, was rotting away. The sides of the well were slimy, green with mold. Far below, at the base, I could see broken glass, and sand, and mud. That a child of eleven could climb down into it, at night, without fear, coming to no harm, was unbelievable. Yet it was true.

I turned away from the well and looked through the dusty windows of the master's house. The blankets were still heaped on the floor where Marie-Noël had lain. I went round to the orchard at the back, and the window through which I had climbed that morning was now closed. I passed through to the front once more, by the sheds. Gaston must have told them at the cottage that I was here, for Marie-Noël was coming across the ground toward me.

Suddenly I did not know what to say to her. I had thought I should see Julie first. Julie would have told me how she had taken the news.

"Don't laugh," she called to me.

Laugh? I had never felt less like laughing in my life. I stood still, baffled, not knowing what she meant.

"I'm wearing Pierre's clothes," she said. "This is his jersey, and his black overall. Madame Yves made me change out of my blue frock because it was damp."

I realized then that she was indeed wearing things that didn't fit. They were too short, making her legs longer and thinner than ever, and she had borrowed a pair of sabots, too, which were much too large, so that when she walked she had to shuffle her feet to keep them on.

"Look," she said, "I'm taller than Pierre, and he's twelve."

I stood awkwardly, looking down at her. Surely, I thought, there must be something that a father does or says at a time of tragedy like this? He would not just stand as I was doing.

"I couldn't fetch you before ——" I began, but she did not wait for me to finish. She took my hand and said, "I'm glad you didn't. Come and see what we've been making, Pierre and I," and led me over to a mound of rubble beside a heap of waste glass. "There is the château," she said, pointing to the small glass model which had been in her pocket that morning, "and these other pieces are the houses in St. Gilles. That big block is the church. Look, Pierre has scooped up gravel to make roads. We've been playing this all afternoon."

Julie couldn't have told her, then. She didn't know. I looked over my shoulder for Julie or Gaston, but I couldn't see either of them.

"Where's Madame Yves?" I asked.

"In the cottage," she said, "talking to Gaston and André. Pierre has gone to the farm for milk. I drank all theirs this morning; they only had a little in a jug. Do you know"—she lowered her voice—"it's very sad, but Pierre's mother doesn't live with them any more. She ran away to Le Mans some weeks ago, and that's why Madame Yves goes in and cooks for André and Pierre. It's such a shocking thing, for a boy to be without his mother and a husband without his wife."

I hadn't given Julie enough time. That had been it. Gaston had brought the letter less than an hour ago. She had not yet found the right moment to break the news. But I was wrong.

"Our situation is very similar," she said. "You have even burned yourself as André did, but his burn will last for a lifetime, and yours only for a few days. Also, we shall have the consolation of knowing that maman is well cared for. After all, as Madame Yves explained, it is better to be with Jesus Christ in paradise than with a mechanic in Le Mans." She stood up, brushing the sand from her knees. "When Ernest came back and said that maman had been taken to hospital, I knew what would happen," she went on. "My dreams have a habit of coming true. But at least this was an accident. In my dream we were trying to kill her on purpose. How did maman come to fall from the window?"

"I don't know," I said. "Nobody knows."

"I shall find out," she said. "It will console maman in paradise if we know."

Then she picked up the glass château and put it in her pocket, and took my hand and we walked over to the lodge. Julie was coming in at the gate with Gaston.

"The things are dry now," she called. "You had better change. You can't go back to the château dressed like that. Quickly, then."

She bustled Marie-Noël into the lodge and turned to me. "She has been very courageous," she said. "You can be proud of her."

"It's happened too suddenly," I said. "She hasn't felt it yet."

Julie looked at me with pity, as she had done that morning. "Do you know so little about children, Monsieur Jean," she asked, "that you imagine, because they don't cry, therefore they feel nothing? If so, you're much mistaken." She spoke quickly, as though she were trying to defend the child against some accusation. Then she recovered herself. "Excuse me, the truth is, the child won all our hearts today. My condolences, Monsieur le Comte, in your great loss."

The proprieties were restored between us. The concierge of the glass foundry was speaking to the seigneur of St. Gilles. I bowed my head and thanked her. Then I turned to her again as a friend.

"You have done a lot for us today, Julie," I said. "I believed it better for you to break the news than anyone else. And I was right."

"She needed no telling," Julie answered. "It was she who told us. The dream had warned her, she said. For my part, I have never believed in dreams, Monsieur Jean. Only that children, like animals, are close to God." She looked over the waste ground toward the master's house and the well. "I suppose," she said, "there will be a public inquiry? You will not be bringing Madame Jean back to the chateau until it is over?"

I had been too dazed at the hospital, and too distressed, to consider such a thing as an inquest. But Julie was right, of course.

"I'm not sure what the arrangements are, Julie," I said. "I left it all to Monsieur Paul and to Mademoiselle Blanche."

Marie-Noël came out of the lodge, changed back into her frock and coat. She kissed Julie and we said good-by, and Gaston drove us back to St. Gilles. As we passed through the gateway I saw there were four other cars in the drive.

"There's Doctor Lebrun's car," said Marie-Noël, "and Monsieur Talbert's too. I don't know about the others."

Talbert—he was the lawyer who had written the letter which I had found in the safe. No doubt he looked after the family affairs. Then, as we drew up behind them and got out, we saw a man in a policeman's uniform seated behind the wheel of the first car.

"It's the commissaire de police's car," Gaston murmured. "He must have come with Monsieur Talbert and the doctors."

"Why do they all have to come?" asked Marie-Noël. "They aren't going to arrest anyone, surely?"

"They always come," I said, "if there's been an accident. I shall have to see them. Will you go and find Germaine and ask her to read to you?"

She went up the terrace and in through the door, and I turned to Gaston.

"The commissaire will probably have to question your wife," I said. "She was here at the time of the accident."

"Yes, Monsieur le Comte."

He looked anxious. I was anxious too. The nightmare of the day was not yet over. I entered the château and heard voices coming from the salon. They ceased as I opened the door, and everyone turned and looked at me. I recognized Doctor Lebrun, and Doctor Moutier from the hospital. The third was small, thick-set, with graying hair. This was presumably the lawyer, Talbert. The fourth, who had a more official air, must be the commissaire de police.

My first thought was for the comtesse. I looked across the room and saw that she was still sitting in the chair beside the fireplace, commanding, indomitable. She showed no sign of fatigue.

"Here is my son, monsieur," she said to the commissaire. And then turning to me, "Monsieur Lemotte has been so good as to come himself from Villars to ask the necesssa questions."

The three men approached me, anxious show their sympathy. Then, the courtesi over, the commissaire turned to me.

"Both Doctor Lebrun and Doctor Mouti have informed me, monsieur, that your wi was expecting a child within a few weeks, a I understand there was some increase nervousness lately," he said. "Would yo agree?"

"Yes," I replied. "That's quite correct."

"She was, perhaps, unduly apprehensiv about the birth?"

"I think she was."

"Excuse me, monsieur," interrupted Ta bert, the lawyer. "Monsieur le Comte w forgive the explanation, but the birth wa eagerly awaited both by him and by Madam Jean de Gué. They hoped for a son."

"Naturally," said the commissaire, "all pa ents are the same."

"But especially in this case," said the law yer, "because under the terms of her marriag settlement the birth of a son meant an in mediate increase of income, above all st Monsieur le Comte. I know, from what sh said to me, that Madame Jean de Gué dreade disappointing her husband, and indeed th whole family. This would, I think, accoun for more nervousness than usual."

"'Dread' is surely a strong word, Maître Talbert." They turned to the speaker in he armchair by the fireplace. "My daughter-in law had no need to dread any one of us. W are not so dependent on the terms of a ma riage settlement that we cannot exist withou its help. My late husband's family has been i possession here for three hundred years."

The lawyer flushed. "I was not suggestin, madame, that Madame Jean de Gué was i any way intimidated by her situation. It wa just that the birth of a son would have ease the financial difficulties considerably. She wa aware of that."

The commissaire looked at Doctor Lebrun who hesitated, glancing at the countess and then at me. "Madame Jean was certainly anxious for a son," he said. "In fact, she stressed the point when I attended her las week. No doubt this anxiety added to he nervous state."

"In short," said the commissaire, "Madame Jean de Gué was inclined to hysteria. Forgive me, monsieur, I only wish to establish that your wife was particularly agitated at the time of the accident, and therefore, in her condition, more liable to attacks of giddiness. You would agree, docteur?"

"Of course, of course."

"And you, monsieur?"

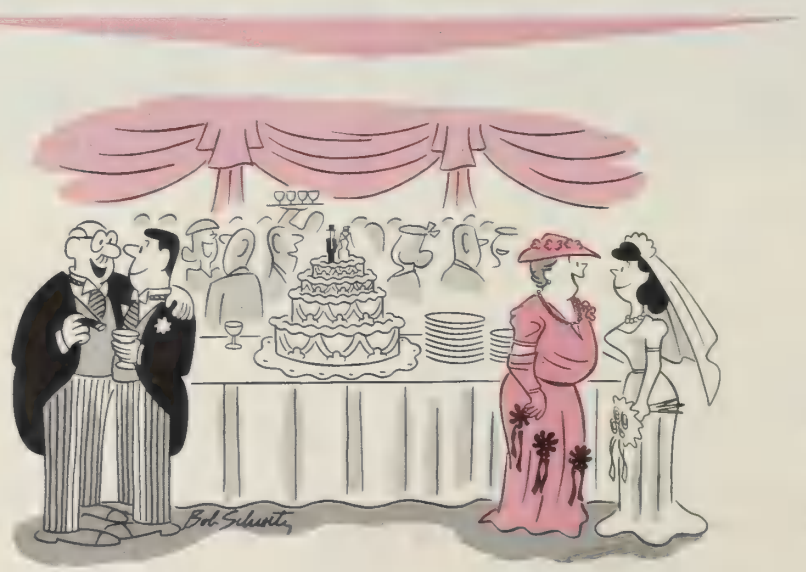
"I suppose so," I replied. "She was also anxious about her little girl. You have been told what happened?"

"Monsieur Paul de Gué and Mademoiselle Blanche have given me their account of it. Also a femme de chambre. I am glad the little one was found eventually. The last time you saw Madame Jean de Gué was this morning before you went to look for the child?"

"That is so, yes."

"You left her in bed, presumably to await your return with news of the child's safety?"

"Yes."



"Everybody, then, seems to have left the house, with the exception of the two femmes de chambre—Germaine and Charlotte; the cook, who was below; and of course Madame la Comtesse, who was in her room upstairs. I have examined the spot where your wife fell," he added to me. "I propose going to the bedroom directly, with your approval."

"Of course," I said.

"I have already questioned Berthe, monsieur. She saw your wife leaning from the window, as though reaching out—so she described it—and then she grasped at the air, as it seemed, and fell. Berthe screamed for help, and was heard by the cook and Charlotte, who went instantly to the moat. The cook telephoned for the ambulance from Villars, and Doctor Moutier has told you the rest. I should like to establish the fact that nobody else went to the bedroom after Germaine, the femme de chambre, took up her breakfast."

"Charlotte might have done," said Renée.

Perhaps you would ring for her, monsieur?" suggested the commissaire.

"Charlotte is my personal maid; I will ring for her," said the comtesse. A hand went out from the armchair to the bell rope. "You won't learn much from her. Servants always have their heads in a disaster."

When Gaston answered the bell she told him the commissaire wished to speak to Charlotte.

"I don't quite follow," said Paul, "why it matters what Charlotte or Germaine said to my sister-in-law. It has no bearing on the fact that she became giddy and fell from the window."

"I am sorry, monsieur," said the commissaire. "I quite understand the distress all this must cause to the family. It is just that I wish to ascertain to my own satisfaction that the cause of the fall was accidental. As I have already said, in my view the cause is more likely to have been a sudden attack of giddiness. But I have to make quite sure."

"Do you mean," asked Blanche, "that my sister-in-law may have fallen from the window purposely?"

"It is possible, madame. Not probable." There was a sudden silence, a silence filled, it seemed to me as I looked from one to another of their troubled faces, with swift, unspoken denial, born of their inner guilt, that each one of them might have contributed to Françoise's death. None of them was free from a measure of responsibility for the state of mind which had perhaps led Françoise to her death.

The tension was broken when Charlotte came into the room. "You sent for me, madame la Comtesse?"

"Monsieur Lemotte has some questions to ask you, Charlotte," replied the Countess.

"I want to know," said the commissaire, "whether you had any conversation this morning with Madame Jean de Gué."

Charlotte flashed an angry look at me, and realized that she believed he was asking her this question because of some remark or complaint of mine.

"I only saw Madame Jean for a few minutes," she said. "I spread no gossip, made no mischief. If Monsieur le Comte thinks I have been causing trouble, he is wrong. I said nothing to Madame Jean about the telephone conversation."

"Telephone conversation?" said the commissaire. "What telephone conversation?"

Charlotte must have realized that she had made a mistake. She looked resentfully at her mistress, and then at me. Anxiety to cover her last actions had led to her own betrayal. "I beg your pardon," she said. "I thought Monsieur le Comte wanted to find fault with me. It happened to overhear a long-distance call from his to Paris, but I never mentioned this to Madame Jean. It wasn't for me to add to her worries."

Everyone turned in my direction. It was the Comtesse who broke silence first.

"My son's telephone call was a business one," she said. "It can have no possible bearing on the present situation."

The commissaire coughed apologetically. "I have no desire to probe into Monsieur Jean de Gué's financial affairs, madame," he said, "but anything that might have increased his wife's anxiety is of interest." He turned to me. "Did she know about this telephone conversation?" he asked.

"She did," I said. "It referred to a contract I had negotiated in Paris."

The commissaire turned to Charlotte. "Why did you think the telephone call to Paris might have added to Madame Jean de Gué's worries?" he asked. His tone was not unkindly, merely abrupt.

Charlotte, already hostile, took it as further reproof. Once again she looked at me spitefully. "That is for Monsieur le Comte to say, not me," she replied.

Paul intervened. "This is quite ridiculous," he said. "My brother had renewed a contract with the firm of Carvalet in Paris. We were delighted he had done so. Failure would have necessitated closing down the verrerie. As it is, we have renewed on terms which will enable us to carry on, at any rate for a further six months. My sister-in-law was as pleased as the rest of us."

Talbert stepped forward, looking puzzled. "I don't want to contradict you, monsieur," he said to Paul, "but your facts are surely wrong? Carvalet sent me a copy of the new contract only this morning. It is substantially different from the last, and the terms most decidedly to your disadvantage. I was amazed when I read it."

Paul stared at the lawyer. "What do you mean?" he said. "How can the contract be to our disadvantage? The terms are most favorable."

"No," I said.

I saw the commissaire glance surreptitiously at his watch. The tangled finances of the De Gués were not his concern.

"I can explain to my brother later about the contract," I said quickly. "I can assure you now that my wife was not in the least concerned about it. I took her into my confidence, and she appreciated it. There is nothing more I can say. Now, are you ready to go upstairs and inspect her room?"

"Thank you, monsieur." He turned to Charlotte for his last question. "Apart from natural anxiety over the little girl, you found Madame Jean de Gué her usual self?"

Charlotte shrugged her shoulders. "I suppose so," she said sullenly. "I don't know. Madame Jean was easily discouraged and depressed. She told me this last upset of hers had come about because some favorite pieces of porcelain had been broken. She set great store by her possessions. She even dusted them herself, and would let no one touch them. 'At least they're mine,' she used to say. 'They're not part of St. Gilles.'"

The venomous parting stroke embraced us all. The château stood condemned. I wondered if the commissaire saw Françoise as I saw her, an isolated figure clinging to the treasures of the home she had left, lonely, neglected, sought after solely for the sake of her fortune.

The commissaire asked whether he might now see the bedroom, and I took him upstairs, the others remaining in the salon. As we went along the corridor he said to me, "I must again express regret, monsieur, for all this inconvenience, and for adding to your distress at such a time."

"Please don't apologize," I said. "You have been very considerate."

I opened the door of the bedroom, and as we entered I saw that the shutters were no longer closed, as I had left them, but were flung wide, and the windows, too, thrust back against the wall. The child's legs still touched the floor, but her body was across the sill, one hand grasping the window frame, the other, with her head and shoulders, out of sight. I heard the commissaire catch his breath. I put my hand on his arm. To dash forward was the impulse of us both, yet to do so might have startled her, causing her to lose the hold she already had.

For the eternity of perhaps ten seconds we waited, immobile. Then the child's hand shifted its grip, the feet touched the floor more firmly, the body wriggled back across the sill, and the whole of her emerged from the wide space between the windows. She slipped back into the room to face us, her eyes shining, her hair disheveled.

"I've got it," she said. "It was caught on the ledge."

The commissaire found his voice before I did. I could not speak. I could only stare at Marie-Noël, who was safe and unaware of the danger to which she had been exposed. She seemed to be holding what looked like a duster in her hand.

"What have you got, my child?" he asked gently.

"Maman's locket," she said. "The locket papa brought her last week from Paris. She must have been shaking her duster out of the window, as she always did, and the locket was caught in it. They were lying together on the ledge below. I leaned out and saw them." She came toward us. "Look," she said, "the pin of the locket is sticking into the duster. Unless I had climbed out as far as I did I couldn't have reached them. If maman had only rung her bell, Gaston or someone would have rescued them for her. But she was impatient. She thought she could reach them herself." She looked at the commissaire. "Are you religious?" she asked.

"I hope so, mademoiselle," he said, taken aback.

"Papa is not. He is a skeptic. But finding the locket and the duster was an answer to prayer. I said to the Sainte Vierge, 'I did little for maman when she was alive. Let me do something for her now she is dead.' The Sainte Vierge told me to lean out of the window. I did not want to do it but I found the locket. I still don't know why that should help maman, unless it is that to her, in paradise, it seems better for her daughter to wear the locket than to let it lie sadly forgotten on a ledge."

YOUNG HOLLYWOOD AT HOME

"When we were practically children we worked at the same place—N.B.C. in New York—and never knew each other." Ann was a child singer, Jim a page boy at the studio. They were introduced 3000 miles later. Meantime, Jim had gone on to medical school, served as Navy doctor with the marines in the Pacific, and moved west with his family when his brother was offered a part on the Jack Benny radio show. Ann's career had led her to the San Carlos Opera Company in New York where she sang for three seasons, then to Broadway to star as daughter in the play Watch on the Rhine, and later to tour with the play to California, where she was offered a movie contract. Just as success was growing after the prize-winning film, Mildred Pierce, a toboggan accident broke her back and crippled her for fourteen months, and there was another blow to be faced in the loss of her mother shortly afterward. An uncle and aunt moved from Connecticut to substitute as parents. It was at the home Ann shared with them that she met Jim, who was brought to call by friends of the family, and they were married on June 27, 1953. Every month since then the McNultys have celebrated the twenty-seventh, usually with some sort of small gift hidden in the big house. It may be shaving lotion, socks, compact or perfume—"something the other has mentioned needing." Occasionally it will be a portable radio or amethyst ring, "but we usually talk over the bigger things and budget for them."

Timmie imitates the budgeting by dropping his own funds, pennies left over from supermarket change, in a favorite pig bank that tips its hat. Since rolling a cart down a grocery aisle is his own high spot in life, on a Saturday morning one or another parent takes him shopping. Ann enjoys choosing her own party supplies, is no stranger to her kitchen where a big freezer now gives more chance to experiment. "I've had good luck making pizza dough in advance—even in freezing spaghetti." She is expert, too, at curry dishes, but often cooks the man-sized roasts her husband likes best. To the despair of plump colleagues, 98-pound Ann diets to gain weight—hoping to rise to 100 pounds—and eats a hearty breakfast of orange juice, cereal with bananas, toast, eggs and coffee, a healthy lunch, and a steak-and-apple-pie dinner without adding to a 22″ waist. All holidays—from Valentine's Day to Halloween to New Year's—are "good excuses for parties" in the McNulty house. When baby Maureen was due, in December, Ann made a point of trimming a tree early in the month to come home to a prefestive setting.

In the busy household, she wishes only that she had time for oil painting, a hobby for which she bought a complete artist's set several years ago. So far it hasn't been opened, but is stored on the unfinished second floor along with the box that holds her lavish satin-and-lace wedding dress ("for Maureen to be married in—if she likes it"), other cartons holding Jim's yearbooks, more holding curios and souvenirs and family snapshots. Ann is a saver by nature—"It's a real comfort to have an attic." Someday the upper story will hold extra workrooms—"We're beginning to need them"—but in the McNulty household there'll always be generous space left for sentiment.

people in the same or affiliated businesses or professions.

Now, a man who has worked for many years in a business or industry has reached "retirement age." The firm gives him a dinner. The president rises and pays him a fulsome tribute and presents him with a gold watch. His colleagues slap him on the back and congratulate him. "Lucky dog, no more having to get in by nine o'clock." He himself is, for the moment, elated. It's going to be swell to get up when one feels like it, relax, have a vacation for the rest of one's life, do all the things one has dreamed about!

But after a few weeks he realizes that he is on the shelf—permanently. He calls up the fellows he used to lunch with, but they have other "business" engagements. He has an idea for the business, as he often has had before, but there's no one to communicate it to. Nobody cares.

On that day when he got the gold watch he felt swell. He's made sixty-five with no serious disorders of health. He has been accustomed to have people say, "You don't look a day over fifty." Now he feels as old as time. Nobody wants his accumulated experience. Nobody cares for his advice. Perhaps he's only been a shipping clerk, but what he didn't know about a shipping room nobody ever would. One day he meets an old colleague from the firm and asks, "Who heads the shipping room now?"

"They've got a young fellow in, and between us, it's a mess. Wish you were back." And he thinks to himself, Why did I have to quit?

The people at the top don't quit—men of seventy and even eighty sit on boards of directors. United States senators don't retire at sixty-five. Self-employed professional men don't either. They work as long as they feel like it, which is usually until the day they die, delegating responsibilities, taking longer vacations, but becoming "deans" of their professions. Most Presidents of the United States have left office at an age over the retirement limit for hired employees, and retired "overage" generals become counselors of corporations.

Industrial pension systems begin to operate against employees, long before they reach the arbitrary retirement age. A man of fifty, looking for a job, is up against it, no matter what his competence, experience and vitality. In fifteen years the firm is going to have to retire him and pay him a pension, and they'd rather have someone who will be with them a longer time.

The automatic operation of retiring people at sixty-five would be arguable if there were a surplus of labor. But, except for a few industries, there is no surplus. Our economy is tight. Industries need and seek competent employees, but throw out still-vigorous men and women for the purely arbitrary reason of age. Yet age is not measured by years. Nature does not equally distribute energy. Some people, it seems to me, are born old and tired, while others are going strong at seventy.

Many widowed people marry again after sixty, and it's the most sensible thing they could do. Theirs are not marriages of romantic love, but usually contracted between old and affectionate friends, for comfort and companionship.

But in any case, men and women who retain vital contacts with the world of work are less lonely than they would otherwise be. If they lunch with their fellow workers, they can more easily endure dinners alone. If they leave their lonely dwellings every morning, they can enjoy their quiet in the evening.

Reflect upon your present blessings, of which every man has many; not on your past misfortunes, of which all men have some.
CHARLES DICKENS

It is a great deal easier to retire with a companion at your side. Then you don't go home to park on the children! But the Social Security system militates even against such marriages. The widow who inherits, as a dependent, her husband's Social Security loses it if she remarries, though her new husband may also be dependent on Social Security.

Under the Social Security system, if a person is under seventy-two he loses one month's benefit check for each $80 he earns in excess of $1200 per year, so in hundreds of thousands of cases, to continue to work after sixty-five means to suffer a financial loss. Yet if an elderly person has an income of $100,000 a year from investments or inheritance, he can draw his full Social Security at sixty-five, and add it to his other income. Or continue to work and forget the deferred benefits. Social Security penalizes only work.

The twenties and thirties saw a revolt of youth. The fifties should, I think, see a revolt of age.

Age needs an FEPC. Age should demand, first, that pension and Social Security payments due at sixty-five or inherited should not be made dependent upon subsequent earnings and should not be revocable by remarriage.

Age should make organized protest against being put on the shelf for no other reason than an arbitrary date. Many a man or woman who can no longer carry the burden of an accustomed job can perform with high efficiency during shorter hours or at lighter tasks. Industries can and should create openings for such persons who do not want to retire. But the older members of our society should resist being automatically pushed over the cliff.

Then we won't end up while still able-bodied and able-minded living with a white sofa, and being pests. END

The Plight of the Old

A kitchen story with a happy ending.

It all happened

when a good cook moved into an old house.

I was once a depressing sight—I'll admit it. Of all the dark and shabby rooms in the Victorian house Bob and Eleanor Faherty bought two years ago, I was the darkest and shabbiest. Imagine a kitchen with chocolate-colored woodwork and mustard-colored walls and a plasterboard ceiling that sagged in the middle! Imagine trying to bake a feather-light cake in such heavyhearted surroundings! No wonder Eleanor threw up her hands in horror the first time she saw me.

As soon as they moved in, all the Fahertys—Bob and Eleanor and sons Chuck and Bobby—rolled up their sleeves and started scrubbing, painting, plastering and sewing. Room after room was miraculously transformed; gradually the house took on a fresh, charming look. But what about me? After all, I was an important room. Set practically at the center of the house, I was the center of daily living, too; since the dining room had been converted to a bedroom, the Fahertys ate all their meals at the porcelain-topped table in the middle of my floor. The floor (only partially covered by a strip of ancient linoleum) was badly warped.

than one visitor at a time—not even Toby. She says husbands are exhausting. And she gives me herb tea. It tastes like stewed hay, but it's very strengthening."

Candy said gently, "How about getting out-of-doors? Couldn't Toby take you for a little drive?"

Clover flushed suddenly. "I'm afraid not yet, Candy. You see"—she drew a sharp breath—"Toby—thinks I could get up—if I wanted to. He told me last night that—that I was the baby."

Candy was shocked into impulsive protest. "But, Clover, you've been very ill! Surely Toby realizes that?"

Two tears rolled down Clover's cheeks. She wiped them hastily away. "He doesn't seem to. He—oh, Candy, couldn't you say something to him? Couldn't you make him understand?"

Candy hesitated unhappily. "Hasn't Miss Gabbett explained?"

"He wouldn't listen," Clover whispered. "He detests her! He's—I never thought Toby would be so —— Oh, Candy, I thought it was going to be such fun to get the baby home and—and—but it isn't! It's miserable! If you won't help me ——" Steps sounded along the hall.

"I'll see what I can do," Candy promised quickly; and Miss Gabbett marched into the room bearing six pounds of handsome rose-colored masculinity, devoid of hair.

Clover put up her arms, and in her small, pale face was an expression Candy knew she could never forget: a look compounded of hunger, pride and pure, unalloyed delight.

Miss Gabbett said, "Just five minutes, mommy. We mustn't get overexcited, must we? And manikins don't like to be handled, you know ——"

Half an hour later, Candy walked up her own front path, so deep in thought that she nearly ran into the stocky figure of Toby Tuckwell, himself. Normally, Toby resembled a well-fed ten-year-old; now his rosy face and round blue eyes looked strained.

"Hello, Candy," he said tautly. "I thought I'd drop in and see you for a minute. That is, if you're not busy?"

Candy's heart sank; but she forced a note of cordiality into her voice. "Not a bit, Toby. You're just the person I want to see."

Toby dropped into a chair. "I'll come right to the point. You've seen Clover, haven't you?"

Candy said carefully, "Yes. I didn't think she seemed awfully . . . well."

Toby glanced at her quickly. "No. And I wonder why not."

"Do you?" Candy asked coolly. "After what she's been through?"

"It's been almost six weeks," Toby pointed out. "Other girls have premature babies ——"

"Other girls," Candy pointed out crisply, "aren't Clover."

"Clover," Toby countered, "isn't being Clover. At the moment."

"It's hardly her fault ——" Candy began.

Toby cut in sharply: "It isn't her fault at all! It's that nurse. She's a thoroughgoing menace. She's turning Clover into a complete hypochondriac."

Candy stared at him, disconcerted. This was not the lighthearted Toby Tuckwell she had grown to know so well; this was a new, embattled and rather overwhelming Toby. "Well, of course Miss Gabbett is old-maidish and fussy ——" she began.

"And full of ridiculous ideas." Toby bit off the words. "She's a dangerous woman, and she's going to be asked politely to leave."

Candy gasped. "But you can't, Toby! Clover isn't nearly well enough to ——"

"No," Toby interrupted, "she isn't. Which in my opinion is entirely Gabbett's doing."

Candy sat quite still, her thoughts skittering madly about in her head: Was it possible that Toby was right? Or was this simple, husbandly jealousy?

"The doctor says Gabbett is a first-rate nurse," Toby was saying. "He thinks it's Clover herself. I don't agree. After all, I know Clover, and she's very . . . well, suggestible; but she's not a neurotic. Anyway, he claims there isn't another nurse available in town. Not even a practical one."

Candy said bluntly, "What do you want me to do?"

Toby looked worried. "Well, I know it's a lot to ask of you, Candy, but obviously I can't let Gabbett go until there's someone to take her place. Someone normal and healthy and sensible. Someone who will let Clover stop being an invalid. I can't telephone from the house and I haven't privacy at the office. If you could try?"

"I see," Candy said slowly. "You want a competent nurse ——"

"I want," said Toby tensely, "a wife. And I wouldn't mind including a son." He stood up. "I know you think I'm being pretty tough, Candy, but if you'll help ——"

Candy said helplessly, "Well, of course, Toby—I'll try, but ——"

"Thanks," said Toby briefly.

After he had left, Candy went slowly upstairs, her thoughts whirling. She had promised to help Clover by "speaking to" Toby; that had certainly been a failure. And now she found that she had promised to help Toby by acting behind Clover's back. If only she could discuss the whole situation with Bill! But Bill had already shown rather clearly his lack of interest in any problems but his own. She sighed and went into the nursery.

While she gave David and Sarah their supper, while she acted as referee for several rather drastic differences in opinion, even while she read Mary Poppins aloud, her mind was busy, twisting and turning—and coming to no conclusion. The nursery door opened a Bill's face peered in. Candy paused at the e of a sentence.

"Coming down soon?" he inquired. (doesn't even ask how the children are.)

"Hi, daddy," said David cordially.

"Hi," said Bill.

Sarah eyed him levelly. "Run away now she ordered. "Don't be a newsomes. We streamly busy."

"Sarah, that's not the way ——" Candy gan on a stern note. "I'll be down soo Bill. As soon as I finish this chapter."

"And another," added Sarah cozily.

"No," said Candy.

"Yes," said Sarah, on a rising inflection.

Bill vanished.

At supper, Candy said, "I saw Clover day. I don't think she's very well. Toby is termined to fire her trained nurse."

"He better look out," Bill said. "I bet woman knows some pretty fast judo."

Candy said thoughtfully, "Bill—do think Toby is a cruel man?"

"Sure," Bill said promptly. "Got a bru face and decadent instincts." Candy push back her chair. "Where are you going?"

"If you're not going to be serious, I'm go upstairs to look at the children ——"

"They haven't left home," said Bill.

"—— and," Candy added coldly, "to te phone. I've got to find another nurse for Tuckwells. And, also, I want to . . . think."

"Candy"—Bill was quite serious now "could you do something for me?"

"I'd love to, darling," she told him tiently. "In about twenty minutes."

But it was more than an hour later wh she came downstairs again, and Bill had go up to bed and was asleep over his book.

It was a busy week, a good deal of which w spent on the telephone. Between fruitless cal Candy dealt singly and collectively wi nt Harriet lifted the mauve violets from her head. "I presume," she said mildly, "that it is not Clover who is unmarried? No. And this—er—Toby likes his wife but not his wife's nurse? Yes. Interesting. At four? I shall be ready."

Candy was aware of a keen if inexplicable sense of anticipation as she took Aunt Harriet across Indigo Gate.

Miss Gabbett did not at first appear. Aunt Harriet, in answer to a question of Clover's, launched into a spirited description of her private war with Central America which reduced both Candy and Clover to helplessness. Then Miss Gabbett entered the room with Thomas Tuckwell; to Candy's bewilderment, Aunt Harriet's sparkle faded before their eyes to a pastel fragility. Aunt Harriet was visibly impressed by Miss Gabbett's starched authority. She listened quietly while Miss Gabbett advised Clover not to get our little manikin overexcited, not to eat any of Bertha's chocolate cookies ("We mustn't spoil our appetite for supper, must we?") and on no account to consider taking a brisk walk on the following day with Mrs. Howe.

"We mustn't overdo, must we?" said Miss Gabbett.

"Indeed we mustn't," Aunt Harriet cooed unexpectedly. "And neither," she added earnestly, "must our Miss Gabbett—must she?"

Miss Gabbett shirred her lips, unshirred them, smiled uncertainly, and then bridled in a small, economical way.

With a little difficulty, Aunt Harriet managed to get to her feet, looking elderly.

"Will you come again, Mrs. Howe?" Clover asked eagerly.

"My dear, I should love to"—Aunt Harriet turned deferentially—"if Miss Gabbett thinks it advisable?"

Miss Gabbett, seeing them off, was almost gracious. At the front door, Aunt Harriet put out one small, apologetic hand. "You'll forgive an old lady for saying that you look—well, rather worn, my dear? You mustn't forget yourself, you know. Next time," she quavered from the porch, "I shall hope to see you looking a great deal better, dear Miss Gabble."

The door closed behind them slowly.

They were halfway home when Aunt Harriet remarked meditatively that she never trusted a woman who wore no lipstick. At Candy's startled look, she added impatiently, "Means she doesn't feel like a woman. Which is dangerous."

Candy, thoroughly bewildered, said, "Then—don't you like her?"

MARY'S LAMB

BY GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Mary had a little lamb;
For two 'twas scarcely ample.
And that was the night her spouse brought home
Two old school cronies, a customer from Dubuque, the boss, a taxi driver, and an unidentified man with bifocals and hiccups, to give them of Mary's cooking an impromptu sample!

"Oh, she's mean enough to steal acorns from a hog," Aunt Harriet remarked cheerfully. "Clover is a sweet child. She shouldn't have that woman near her. As a matter of fact, she probably doesn't need a nurse at all."

"Oh, but Aunt Harriet ——"

"I had six. Eight miles from town. In my own bed. Without any nurse. Your Uncle Harry was a seven-month baby—weighed four pounds and looked like a lavender rat."

Candy seized her temper by the coattails. "Well, of course, you're remarkable, Aunt Harriet. Most girls don't feel so spritely."

"I felt awful," said Aunt Harriet flatly. "I couldn't lift a finger—until one day your Great-uncle Henry threw my copper-luster teapot out the spare-room window."

"Oh!" said Candy.

"He said it was an accident!" Aunt Harriet's eyes grew misty. "Wonderful man. I loved him for forty years. When Henry lost his temper, the lightning rods fell off the barns all over the county. . . . So I got up."

"Oh," said Candy.

"Who's that on the front step?" inquired Aunt Harriet sharply.

"That," said Candy, "is Toby Tuckwell. He ought to be at home."

"Why, dear?" Aunt Harriet inquired interestedly.

And then they were at the front door.

Bill was waiting for them. Candy went upstairs to see the children. If she begins to tell me, Candy thought crossly, why I ought to go to that convention with Bill, I'll scream. We're not all superhuman.

As she came downstairs half an hour later, a burst of laughter met her ears. In the living room, Bill and Toby were leaning eagerly toward Aunt Harriet, cozily ensconced on the sofa. Aunt Harriet held up a tiny glass.

"Sherry, my dear!" she called brightly. "Medicinal, of course. I always carry it with me. Come and have some. I've been hearing about this convention of William's ——"

I knew it! Candy thought, pouring a glass of sherry for herself.

"—— and I've made a suggestion."

Candy turned toward them; her sweater felt hot and prickly.

"I'm going along with Bill!" Toby said. "The bank has some business in Baltimore and Clover doesn't need me anyway. How's that for an idea?"

Candy choked on the sherry. "Splendid," she said weakly, when she could speak.

"Have we got enough dinner to feed Toby?" Bill asked.

Candy managed a genuine smile. "Of course we have. That is, if he really wants to stay here."

Toby beamed rosily upon Aunt Harriet. "I certainly do! Thanks a lot. I'll just call up Clover."

It was a very gay meal.

Aunt Harriet took her usual brisk walk the next afternoon, firmly declining all companionship. At dinner that night, she told Candy and Bill that she had stopped in to see that dear little Clover Tuckwell again. She smiled gently.

"I told that nurse of hers, I said, 'Miss Babbit, you sensitive, selfless people push yourselves to the limit and then—psst, like that!—you're gone.' I said, 'You don't look right to me at all ——' Did you swallow a bone, Candace?"

Candy looked at Bill; his face was entirely expressionless. Suddenly she felt unreasonably tired. She took a book upstairs and got into bed.

But the words blurred on the page. I simply do not understand her, she thought. Why is she undermining Miss Gabbett? What is she up to, anyway? Could it be —— Candy stared before her, unseeing. Could it be that Great-aunt Harriet was a very subtle and most effective troublemaker? An elderly busybody, who had to have a finger in everyone's pie?

The telephone rang. Wearily, Candy answered it and heard the small thin voice of Western Union: A telegram for Mrs. Henry Howe. Candy wrote down the message ("Delighted. Joyce."). Then she got out of bed and padded to Aunt Harriet's door. Aunt Harriet glanced at the slip of paper and said:

"Thank you, my dear. I must explain. Queenstown is so delightful that I wired a friend of mine this morning—a Miss Woodhall—telling her to come at once. She'll be staying at the hotel, of course, so you needn't give her a thought. She will arrive on Wednesday."

Candy said bravely, "Of course we'll think about her, Aunt Harriet. Ask her to come to supper on Wednesday evening, won't you?"

Aunt Harriet's smile was warm. "Thank you, my dear. Wednesday—yes, Wednesday will be perfect. Good night," and she shut her door softly.

Candy went slowly back to bed. Aunt Harriet was not only a managing busybody; she was mysterious too.

The next three days, however, were surprisingly pleasant. Queenstown took Mrs. Henry Howe to its hospitable bosom; Bill brightened at her approach; the children christened her Aunt Poppins; even Luella began to send out a watery gleam from behind the clouds. From Candy's point of view, no one could have been a more delightful guest. And yet ——

The blow fell on Tuesday evening. Toby Tuckwell telephoned with the news that Miss Gabbett had announced her imminent departure.

"The old guinea hen says she exhausted," Toby growled. "Though how on earth she could be —— Anyway, she's leaving on Friday. Goodness knows I'm glad to see the last of her—but there isn't anyone to take her place. Will you tell Bill I can't possibly go to Baltimore with him? . . . Yes, I'm disappointed, too, but I'm going to stay and look after Clover and Tommy, of course."

As she reported this conversation, Candy watched Aunt Harriet narrowly; no sign of guilt, not a suspicion of alarm clouded those pale clear blue eyes. Aunt Harriet merely nodded and glanced at Bill, whose face told nothing.

The next afternoon, Candy came back late from a P.T.A. meeting. As she opened the front door, she heard the sound of voices in the living room: Aunt Harriet's, Bill's—and another, a soft, stranger's voice. Wednesday! Miss Woodhall had arrived. Candy dropped her coat, arranged a welcoming smile and walked into the room.

"How do you . . . do?" she said.

Miss Woodhall had got up. Miss Woodhall was, Candy thought, one of the prettiest girls she had ever seen. Aunt Harriet said:

"Candace, dear, I've had really quite a good idea. Joyce is a nurse, the best I know. She says she wouldn't in the least mind looking after Clover."

"I'd love to," Miss Woodhall agreed in a soft, rather deep voice.

Candy frankly stared. Joyce Woodhall had shining brown curls, shining gray-blue eyes, pink cheeks and a small, aristocratic yet impertinent nose. Candy thought, She's the most-washed-looking thing I ever saw!

Bill was beaming. "It solves everything, doesn't it?"

"It—yes," said Candy, "it certainly does." Why didn't I see it? Why didn't I put two and two —— An idea seized her. "Bill ——" she began.

The doorbell rang, a whistle fluted in the hall, and Toby Tuckwell walked into the living room.

Bill said, "Joyce, this is Mr. Tuckwell. I told him about you, but if you two would like to have a talk ——"

So Bill knew all about it! Candy thought with a little pang. And they never told me. But a small voice in her mind spoke quietly: You were busy, my girl—very busy indeed.

Toby grinned. "Talk—what about? All I want to ask Miss Woodhall is when she can start."

Joyce gave him her shining smile. "Well, I just got in an hour ago, Mr. Tuckwell. Would after supper be soon enough?"

Toby emitted a sort of Rebel yell.

Joyce said quickly, "But, Mr. Tuckwell, I ought to tell you—I can stay for only two weeks. You see, my fiancé is on a Canadian carrier and he'll put into Queenstown on the fifteenth. I promised him I'd be here."

Toby lifted a glass of Aunt Harriet's medicinal sherry. "To the Royal Canadian Navy," he said, "and Great-aunt Harriet!"

"Say, Toby," Bill said, "you'll be able to go to Baltimore with me after all."

"Bill ——" Candy began.

Toby shook his head. "I'm sorry, Bill—I've decided to stay with Clover and Tommy. In spite of Miss Woodhall, I think maybe Clover does need me."

Bill nodded; but for just a moment there was an odd expression in his eyes: was it—could it have been wistfulness?

"Bill!" said Candy loudly. "Would you take me instead? I'd love to go—now that Aunt Harriet's here."

She was rewarded by the look in Bill's eyes. "I think that could be arranged," he said, and grinned at her.

Aunt Harriet folded a dress meticulously. Candy, bent over her suitcase, said, "You know, Aunt Harriet, being old doesn't seem to sadden you."

Aunt Harriet said dryly, "Unfortunately, I've always loved minding other people's business—and that's about the only thing old people can do. Of course it's different when you're young. One good husband takes up all a woman's free time. You know that."

"Er—yes," said Candy.

Aunt Harriet went on matter-of-factly: "If an old lady gets a chance to help somebody out of a pickle, she's lucky. The only unlucky thing that ever happened to me was to—to lose Henry." She went over to the window, where she stood with her back to the room for a moment. Then, unexpectedly, she laughed. "Come quick! Look at this!"

Candy peered out over Aunt Harriet's small gray silk shoulders. There, crossing Indigo Gate, was Clover Tuckwell, walking very slowly, and carrying a small, blue-blanketed bundle in her arms. Joyce Woodhall walked close beside her. They were both laughing.

"Hey, Candy!" Bill bellowed from the front hall. "Hurry up—we've only got forty minutes to get to the airport!"

Candy turned from the window. "I'm coming!" she shrieked, and flung herself upon the suitcase. "Oh, this is so exciting!" she babbled. "When you have children and responsibilities, you don't get much chance to travel. If it weren't for you, Aunt Harriet, I couldn't go now."

Great-aunt Harriet smiled. END

the remaining ingredients. In a skillet, sauté 1 large Bermuda onion, chopped (2 cups), in 3 tablespoons butter. When golden, add to the simmering beans along with 1 tablespoon salt, 2 cloves garlic, crushed, ½ teaspoon thyme, ½ teaspoon pepper and ½ teaspoon marjoram. Re-cover pot and simmer over low heat. Then sauté in the same skillet you used for the onions 1 pound large pork sausages (approximately 6) which have been cut into 1" pieces. When nicely browned, add to the beans. Drain off all but about 2 tablespoons sausage drippings from the skillet and add 1 pound beef chuck, cut into 1" cubes and dusted lightly with flour. Brown on all sides and add to beans. Now transfer to a large casserole. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., uncovered, for about 1½ hours. Add 2½ cups canned tomatoes and continue baking until the beans are tender, about a half hour more. Stir occasionally while baking. Approximate cost, $1.85 for 6 servings.

There's an old saying, "Full of beans and benevolence," and when you sample these spicy, delectable, south-of-the-border beans, you'll understand. This meal-in-itself dish needs a crisp, cold, plain green salad, and a refreshing dessert—cold apples with Camembert would be ideal.

CHILE CON CARNE CON FRIJOLES

Wash and pick over 2 cups (1 package) dried pinto or kidney beans. In a deep bowl, cover beans generously with cold water and soak overnight. Drain. Cover and simmer beans in a deep, heavy, 4-quart kettle with 1 quart fresh water and 1 tablespoon salt, for approximately 1½ hours. (To save cooking and soaking time, you might use 3 cans red kidney beans, if you wish.) Sauté three or four slices of bacon in a skillet. Drain on paper toweling. Brown 1 pound ground beef in two tablespoons of the bacon drippings. Add this along with two cloves of garlic, crushed, 1½ cups tomato purée, a can of undiluted consommé, 4 teaspoons chili powder, ½ teaspoon orégano, ¼ teaspoon sage and ¼ teaspoon cumin seed to the simmering beans. Re-cover and continue simmering. Then sauté in two tablespoons butter two cups chopped onion and ½ cup diced green pepper. When the onion and pepper are tender, add to the beans. Continue to simmer, covered, for 2½–3 hours or until the beans are tender. If you use canned beans, just cook until the onion and pepper are tender and flavors are well blended. Season to taste with additional salt and pepper if necessary. Stir occasionally during cooking, but gently; don't break up the beans too much. Pour into a serving dish. Garnish generously with crumbled bacon. Approximate cost: $1.25 for 6 servings.

Here's hearty fare for a cold February night—our golden, luscious bean-and-spareribb casserole (if ever there was companionship among foods, this is it); with a vegetable salad, made with cooked peas, chopped raw celery and carrots, tomato wedges and lettuce. Tossed in mayonnaise dressing thinned with a little lemon juice. A compote of frozen pineapple and fresh oranges for dessert. Sound good?

BEAN-AND-SPARERIB CASSEROLE

Wash and pick over 2 cups (about 1 package) dried pinto beans. In a deep bowl, cover beans generously with cold water and soak overnight. Drain. Simmer beans in a saucepan, covered, with 1 quart fresh water about 1 hour, or until tender. Drain, reserving 2 cups bean liquid. Have 3 pounds of spareribs cut into serving-size pieces. Sprinkle your spareribs liberally with salt and pepper. In a large kettle or Dutch oven, brown spareribs on both sides in ¼ cup hot shortening or salad oil. Remove spareribs from kettle and drain well on paper toweling. Remove all drippings from kettle. Return spareribs to kettle and cover with water. Cover and simmer gently for about 1 hour or until meat is soft and tender. Remove from your kettle and drain. Meanwhile, sauté ■ cup, more or less, of onion in 3 tablespoons butter until golden brown. Mix together in a 4-quart casserole the spareribs, beans and onion. Season with 2½ teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate, ½ teaspoon garlic salt, a generous pinch of thyme and one of marjoram and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Mix well. Pour in bean liquid. Cover. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1 hour. Makes 6 servings, for approximately $2.35.

The navy-bean soup of the Senate Restaurant in Washington has been a mouth-watering tradition for many years, and not only among senators. We are giving you the classic version, and suggesting that you substitute for the ham hocks in the recipe below a two- to three-pound ham butt, if you want a meatier soup, one that could be served as a main dish.

SENATE NAVY-BEAN SOUP

Wash and pick over 1½ pounds (1½ packages) dried pea beans (sometimes called navy beans). In ■ deep bowl, cover beans generously with cold water and soak overnight. Drain. In a large kettle, pour 2½ quarts boiling water over the beans. Then add 2 pounds of smoked ham hocks, or a good meaty ham bone, or a 2–3-pound ham butt, depending on how hearty you want your soup to be. Simmer slowly for about 2½ hours altogether until beans are tender and meat is cooked. Sauté one cup chopped onion in ¼ cup butter until golden. Add to soup after about 1½ hours' cooking. When soup is cooked, remove meat plus bone, and slice meat into delicious pink slivers. Skim excess fat from the broth and crush beans slightly with a fork. Put meat in the kettle with broth and beans. Heat slowly. Season to taste with salt and pepper, right before serving. Seasoning depends upon the type of ham used. (For ham hocks, 1 tablespoon salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper were used.) Add more water if your soup is too thick. Serve garnished with

COOKING TIPS ON BEANS

In each bean dish, we've suggested that you soak the beans overnight before you get your recipe under way. But if you are short of time, or forgot to put them to soak (this can happen), follow this procedure:

Cover with water, bring the beans to a boil, simmer for two minutes, remove from heat, and allow to stand an hour, tightly covered. Then proceed with the recipe, just as if you had soaked them.

All these recipes will freeze well. If you are planning to freeze one of our bean dishes, remove it from heat about twenty minutes before it would normally be ready; cool to room temperature and transfer to freezing containers. When ready to use, thaw, place beans in a casserole in a moderate oven, or in a saucepan over low heat, till bubbling hot.

When adding tomatoes or vinegar to a bean dish, wait till the last hour of cooking, at least, before including them, as the acid will delay the softening of the beans.

Many beans are interchangeable in these recipes. So experiment—try the lentil, tongue and raisin casserole, substituting red kidney beans. And try the classic Senate navy-bean-soup recipe, substituting lentils, or Limas. And so on.

BARBECUED LIMA BEANS

Soak 1 pound dried Lima beans in water to cover. Drain. Save soaking water and add enough additional water to make 6 cups. Add beans and 2 teaspoons salt. Cook with 1 clove garlic, crushed, until beans are almost tender. Then add 2 strips cooked bacon cut into small pieces, ¼ cup chopped celery, ¼ cup chopped green pepper, ¼ cup chopped onion, ¼ cup chili sauce, a pinch of mace, a pinch of basil, 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce, one 8-ounce can tomato sauce and 1 can cocktail frankfurters. Add 1 cup more water. Reseason to taste and bake uncovered in moderate oven, 350° F., 1 hour or until beans are tender. Serves 8, for about 79 cents. Surprised?

"West Indian beans"—the name excites the imagination before you've even tasted it. Here the kidney bean becomes an adjunct to a meal—these exotically flavored beans, pungent with grated lemon rind, orégano and bay leaf, would be the best thing we could think of to serve with a juicy steak, or roast beef—and we're thinking along the lines of a crisp salad of lettuce and endive, and a hot fruit compote for dessert. Canned apricots and pears, heated with a generous dusting of cinnamon, would be good.

WEST INDIAN BEANS

Soak 1 pound red kidney beans overnight in water to cover. Drain and cook until tender in 6 cups boiling water, adding 1 tablespoon salt. Drain. (Here again you may use 3 cans red kidney beans if you wish.) Cut 4 slices of bacon into small pieces. Sauté in a skillet with two cloves garlic, crushed, ¼ cup chopped onion. Add 3 cups canned tomatoes and 1 green pepper cut into strips. Season with two teaspoons grated lemon rind, 1 bay leaf, crushed, 1 teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and a good pinch of orégano. Add the sauce to the beans. Simmer over low heat until sauce thickens. Six servings for about 78 cents.

TONGUE-LENTIL-RAISIN CASSEROLE

In a large kettle, cover a 3–4 pound smoked beef tongue with cold water. Bring to a boil, turn down heat, and simmer 2–2½ hours until tongue is tender. Let cool in broth. Pull off the skin and trim off the root end. Cut into ½" cubes (you will have about 1 quart of cubes). Chill overnight in refrigerator. Wash and pick over 2½ cups lentils (1 package). In a deep bowl, cover the lentils generously with cold water and soak overnight. Drain. Simmer lentils in a saucepan, covered with 1 quart water, until tender, about ½ hour. Sauté in ¼ cup butter 2 cups chopped onion, 2 cups chopped green pepper and 3 cloves garlic, crushed, until onion and pepper are tender. Add 1½ cups (one 12-ounce can) tomato purée and 1 can chicken broth. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon rosemary, 1 teaspoon sugar and ½ teaspoon pepper. Add 1 cup plump white raisins. (To "plump" raisins, place in boiling water for about 5 minutes. Drain.) Layer lentils, then tongue, then tomato mixture into a 4-quart casserole, ending with a layer of sauce. Cover. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 2 hours. Makes 6 servings, approximately $3.10.

KIDNEY BEANS MEXICAINE

Is your spirit of adventure handy? This bean recipe has unsweetened chocolate for an unusual touch. You can hardly detect it as chocolate in the finished product, it's just that special "something." Wash and pick over 2½ cups (1 package) dried red kidney beans. In a deep bowl, cover the beans generously with cold water and soak overnight. Drain. Measure the liquid and add enough water to make 6 cups (you can, if you want, start here with the contents of 3 cans kidney beans). Add 1 cup tomato sauce (one 8-ounce can), 1 cup chopped onion, ½ cup chopped green pepper, 1 clove garlic, crushed, and 1 tablespoon grated unsweetened chocolate. And the beans, of course. Season with 2½ teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon powdered rosemary, 2 teaspoons chili powder, 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate and 6 drops hot red pepper sauce. Simmer, covered, 2½ hours or until the beans are tender and the sauce is well blended. If you use canned beans, bake only about one hour. Surprise ending here. Makes 6 servings for approximately 65 cents.

LAMB-AND-LENTIL STEW

Wash and pick over 2½ cups (1 package) dried lentils. In a deep bowl, cover lentils generously with cold water and soak overnight. Drain. Measure the liquid and add enough water to make 4 cups. Add lentils and simmer until tender. Remove gristle and fat from 2½ pounds lamb shoulder. Cut into 1" pieces. Dust lightly with seasoned flour. Melt 3 tablespoons butter in a deep kettle or Dutch oven and brown the meat thoroughly on all sides. Then add ½ cup chopped onion and 2 cloves garlic, crushed. Sauté until tender and golden brown. Add ¼ cup chopped celery, 4 teaspoons salt, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, 2 teaspoons Worcestershire sauce and ½ teaspoon orégano. Combine with the lentils. Add 4 cups water. Cover and simmer together about ½ hour. Then add 2 cups finely diced carrots and continue cooking until carrots are tender, about ½ hour. Makes 6 servings, about $1.20.

on the one side between what looked on y ground of reason to be the inevitable
, and on the other what every British citi-with indomitable refusal to accept the ict of reason believed the issue would ehow be. Of this deep faith Churchill was unflinching spokesman, in language that live wherever men speak the English gue.

From such a master it was a privilege to learn. I happened sometimes after he had joined the government at the outbreak of war to sit with him on a cabinet committee for the preparation of the King's speeches to Parliament. That was a good education in the use of English—monosyllables wherever possible, and always Anglo-Saxon derivatives in preference to Latin. It was habitual in those days for one member of the war cabinet to broadcast to the country each fortnight, and it happened to fall to my turn to do this in July, 1940, shortly after Hitler had made what the world had generally regarded as some sort of peace offer to us to stop fighting. My speech would therefore be regarded as the reply of the British Government, and I asked the Prime Minister accordingly to let me show it to him before delivery. He suggested that Dorothy and I should spend the weekend at Chequers, and there one evening I read to him what I proposed to say. My argument was not original, but tried to emphasize the point that whatever successes Hitler might achieve in Europe or elsewhere, unless and until he could make an end of the British navy, army and air force, his problem was not solved. I told Churchill that it was obviously awkward, from the point of view of style and presentation, having to mention the three services, though it was no doubt unavoidable. He thought for a moment or two, walking up and down the long room, and then said, "Why not say 'unless that man can sap the might of Britain'?" As of course I did. But what an example of how to use language—and nearly all monosyllables.

The war picture appeared overcast and dark when in November Neville Chamberlain, who had been ill since July, 1940, died. I had been down to see him a few days before the end in a house he had been lent in Hampshire. We had talked together a little about the war of which he had so hoped to see the victorious conclusion, and then he spoke of all the letters he had had from friends. Especially he had been touched by many letters from friends in the House of Commons, which had spoken kindly of the example he had set. This he could not understand at all. With great simplicity he said that he had only tried to do what was right. Then I wished him good-by.

He took my hand in both of his and held it; and so with no more said, but with the full understanding of friends who go their several ways to different duties, we had parted and I was driving back to London, through beech and birch woods in all their gold and silver beauty still catching the glint of the November sun, and thinking again over the many things that we had done together.

Like Baldwin before him, Chamberlain had been consistently misjudged. The misjudgment of Chamberlain was the result, I think, of a variety of reasons. Long before Munich he had shocked substantial sections of opinion by his frank and completely realistic assessment of the strength and weakness of the League of Nations. When it was clear that members of the League, for good reasons or bad, were not prepared to involve themselves in war over questions in which they themselves had no direct interest, it was obviously idle to pretend that there was any such thing as "collective security" on which nations could confidently rely for their own protection. Many people, however, in all political parties shrank from so chilling a conclusion, affecting to believe that readiness to accept it implied a reprehensible lack of idealist sympathy, and that the putting of such gloomy thoughts into words must invite and aggravate the dangers to which the new international gangsterism was daily exposing Europe.

Chamberlain for his part had little patience with mental processes that seemed to him muddled and insincere. He was frankly contemptuous of the wishful thinking about the League in which it was fashionable in some quarters to indulge, and made no effort to conceal his feeling.

Anyone who worked with him—and I suppose I worked as closely with him as anybody—was bound to be impressed by two things. One was his complete disinterestedness and disregard of any thoughts of self; and the other his unfaltering courage and tenacity, once he had made up his mind that a thing was right. These are qualities of signal value for a democratic leader, and all who have the vision to appreciate how close they lie to the roots of health in a democratic state will feel a debt to Neville Chamberlain for his practical demonstration of them.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF SELF-SACRIFICE

The ethic of reverence for life requires that in some way or other and in something or other we should all live as men for men. To those who have no opportunity for human relations in their ordinary work, and who have nothing else to give, it suggests that they should sacrifice some of their own time and leisure even when they have but very little of either. Take up some side line, it says to them, some quite insignificant, perhaps even secret, side line. Open your eyes and look for some man, or some work for the sake of men, which needs a little time, a little friendship, a little sympathy, a little sociability, a little human toil. Perhaps it is a lonely person, or an embittered person, or an invalid, or some unfortunate inefficient, to whom you can be something. It may be an old man or it may be a child. Or some good work is in want of volunteers who will devote a free evening to it or will run on errands for it. Who can reckon up all the ways in which that priceless fund of impulse, man, is capable of exploitation! He is needed in every nook and corner. Therefore search and see if there is not some place where you may invest your humanity.

These potatoes were deep fried with another shortening for 4 minutes at 365 degrees. Compare these results with the potatoes on the right.

These potatoes were deep fried in Fluffo for the same time at the same temperature as those on the left. The overall golden browning is typical of golden Fluffo frying.

Something Golden Happens

(golden crispiness you've never gotten with any other shortening)

Pure shortening, not a table spread.
Golden yellow from pure, wholesome carotene.

Expect surprising results when you use Fluffo; it's an altogether surprising shortening. To make it, we had to break down old-style shortening to its very molecules, and improve them: it takes the cream of the crop to make golden Fluffo.

No other leading shortening gives you such crisp, golden-brown fried foods. Fried right and light in Fluffo, they come out much more golden-brown, and just as digestible as they look.

No other kind of shortening can give you such tender, flaky, golden-brown pies. No change in the measurement your favorite recipe calls for—just a wonderful change in results!

Fluffo even handles differently; it's so much lighter and fluffier it's a joy to use. Blends with fewer, easier strokes, and the golden color lets you see how perfectly you're mixing cake batter or pie dough. Try golden Fluffo: how can you possibly miss?

These rolls of veal, prosciutto and cheese will entice your guests with their unexpected flavors! There are a bowl of green noodles, a delicious sauce, and green salad, crunchy with garlic croutons.

Home to the hearth in February... and the hors d'oeuvre no one can resist is a delicate pink crab-salad dip.

By RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

I think that all inventive cooks like to experiment with foreign dishes that have unexpected flavors. I can't say a word against simple things, such as broiled chicken, steak or fish. They are delightful and indispensable—but for our dinner parties a foreign accent is welcome. The main course of this meal will be definitely Italian.

But let's start at the beginning. For an hors d'oeuvre, we'll have crab-salad spread. The ingredients are the same as for the usual version of this salad—crab meat, eggs, celery and onion—but they are chopped so fine that when mixed with mayonnaise the salad becomes a spread or dip. Lightly buttered slices of party rye are good to spread it on; also, the salad can be scooped up with large corn chips. It doesn't dribble, as most dips do, and I hope you will find it as popular with your guests as I do with mine. Some ripe and stuffed green olives are a nice accompaniment.

The meat dish will be veal rolls piccata—very special, I think. I had it first at the home of a friend who is of Italian birth. I was so crazy about it that she gave me the recipe and I pass it on to you with some slight improvisations of my own. It is made of veal cutlets ½″ thick and pounded to ¼″ thick. They are covered with thin slices of cold boiled ham, or prosciutto if you can get it. Then they are spread with a layer of ground veal and things, a layer of Mozzarella cheese, then rolled up and tied. They are cooked in chicken broth to which chopped mushrooms and white raisins have been added. The rolls are cut into slices 1″ to 1¼″ thick, depending on circumference, and served with the raisin-and-mushroom broth, which is not thickened. This is really something to remember—and to repeat. The inevitable accompaniment will be green noodles with highly seasoned tomato sauce—or if you can't get green noodles, linguine or spaghetti. To complete the main course, a mixed green salad with garlic croutons and poppy-seed rolls.

The dessert will be thinly sliced pineapple, grated coconut and frozen raspberries, a wonderful combination of tastes. The fruit is arranged in an interesting way, and I'll tell you about that when we come to recipes.

These recipes will serve eight people.

CRAB-SALAD DIP

Get a 1-pound can crab meat. Most grocery stores carry several grades of frozen crab, and it pays to get the very best, which will be in chunks. Cut it into very tiny pieces, and be watchful for bits of shell that may have been overlooked by the packer. Chop as fine as possible 4 hard-cooked eggs, enough celery to make ⅔ cup, and onion to make ½ cup. Mix all ingredients, add 2 tablespoons chili sauce, enough CONTINUED ON PAGE 146

CONSIDER THE LILIES

lose his services in the church, but also at the vicarage. I never did think that it was a good idea to have the verger as a handy man. I've got all the flowers I could get hold of, but there isn't a lily among them. How that horrid old woman can sit up there at Crossways, looking out on that magnificent terrace full of them, I don't know! I always feel that she might have a change of heart and ——"

"Well, she won't," prophesied Kathryn. "She doesn't believe in good causes. But I'll go, and I'll ring you up later, Miss Burnley, to say that she said no."

They drove out of the village and presently Kathryn turned the car up an avenue that branched off the main road.

"We'll go now and get it over and done with," she said. "Then we needn't come out again after tea."

"I'm not hungry any more," Caroline told her. "They say that prolonged starvation produces a sort of numb feeling. Well, here we are."

Kathryn stopped the car at the door of a large, ugly red brick building; she sat for a moment looking at it with distaste.

"It's odd," she remarked, "but when I come to this house, I always get a sort of creepy feeling. Honestly, Carol, by the time I've got past that flouncy-looking maid and that waxwork companion and got to that tigerish-looking old woman glaring at me from her chair, I've got the horrors. My legs feel as if they're trying to run out of their own volution."

"Volition."

"I'll look it up when I get home."

"Are we leaving the children in the car?"

"We have to: they're not allowed to set foot inside the house," said Kathryn resentfully.

"What about Dandy's letter?"

"It's a real letter," said Dandy, fishing in his postbag. "It's got a real stamp."

"Then whyfor doesn't it go through the ordinary postal channels?" Caroline inquired.

"It's strictly illegal—but it's fun for Dandy. The postman gives him the Crossways letters to save himself the walk up the drive. . . . Dandy darling, you'll have to put the letter through the letter box, and then I'll ring the bell. . . That's it; now run back to the car, and keep an eye on Delfine."

The door opened and a woman of about forty stood before them. She was tall and powerfully built and might have been called handsome but for the looseness of the large, red mouth and the vindictive stare in her eyes. She was dressed in conventional maid's garb, but her manner was insolent to the point of insult. She addressed Kathryn with a single word.

"Well?"

Kathryn ignored both tone and manner. "I'd like to see Mrs. Lauder, please," she said quietly.

"I'll ask her," said the maid. "Wait here."

She turned away, stooping as she went to pick up the letter from the door mat. A tall woman emerged from the gloom of the passages beyond; her eyes went to the letter. She held out her hand, and after a moment's hesitation the maid handed it to her, and a glance passed between the two, of such naked, undisguised hatred that Kathryn moved nearer to Caroline as though seeking reassurance. The maid disappeared into the shadows of the corridor, and the tall figure came up to the visitors.

"Good afternoon, Mrs. Heywood; good afternoon, Miss Wyatt. You want to see Mrs. Lauder?"

"Please, Miss Parry."

"Will you please come in?"

"Thank you. How is she, Miss Parry?" asked Kathryn.

Miss Parry looked drained and spent, but infinitely enduring. She answered Kathryn's question quietly. "Mrs. Lauder is just the same, thank you. I'll go and ask her if she feels up to seeing visitors."

She left them, to return in a few moments.

"Mrs. Lauder will see you, but only for a moment."

The room into which Kathryn and Caroline followed her was light and sunny, being glassed in on three sides. It commanded a view of a flagged terrace below which was a rockery; beyond the rockery was a long, narrow garden in which bloomed a mass of beautiful lilies. They stood, row upon row, tall and cream, and proud; Caroline had seen them in previous years, but thought that they had never looked so lovely as they did now, with the afternoon sun slanting down on them.

The garden was the only part of the ground upon which any care had been spent; the rest had been left to go to wilderness. From these windows, however, nothing could be seen of neglect or decay: there were only the terrace and the rockery and the lilies and, below and beyond them, a seldom-used path which led by a short route from the garden to the main road along which Kathryn and Caroline had lately passed.

Kathryn kept her eyes resolutely away from the lilies, and fixed them on the shrunken face of the old woman in the wheel chair. She bore without a sign Mrs. Lauder's obvious lack of pleasure in their arrival and, ignoring the hostile expression in the small, peering eyes, got through a brief form of greeting.

"I've brought my sister to see you," she ended. "You met her at Christmas, if you remember."

Mrs. Lauder gave a brief nod, and addressed herself to Kathryn. "Told you I wouldn't have wheeled traffic going through the stables."

"Wheeled traffic?" Kathryn stared at her in bewilderment and then gave a little laugh of comprehension. "Oh—Dandy's bicycle! But Mrs. Lauder, he ——"

"Has a bicycle got wheels?"

"Yes, but ——"

"Then see it doesn't happen again. I allowed you to use that lane as a footpath and only a footpath. Thin end of the wedge, bicycles; next thing, we'll have cars driving through there. I won't have it."

The house which Kathryn and her husband had bought seven years ago had been the property of Mrs. Lauder. The house had been empty and the land unused when Guy, seeking a home in the neighborhood, had chanced to see it. Renamed Whitewings, it was now a long, low building with old beams and modern amenities, charming outside and in. The only drawback to its perfection was the fact that it had a somewhat difficult approach. It stood a mere half mile or so from the village of Downsview, but its drive curved widely round Crossways House and came out upon the main road some three miles from the church and the shops. Kathryn could walk to the village in less time than it took to drive there, but the walk was along the right of way over which Mrs. Lauder specified no wheeled traffic should pass. Kathryn disliked the walk along the short cut. The lane went past the deserted stables of Crossways House, at one point crossing the wide old cobbled stableyard. The buildings were rotting, and were half hidden by creepers; the place had a desolate, haunted look and Kathryn found it so strangely frightening that there were times when she preferred to walk to the village the long way round—a proceeding manifestly absurd, she told herself angrily. She was not usually nervous, and could find no reason for her fear of passing the stables, but nothing could overcome the fear. To her husband the path was simply a short cut through the stables, quick and convenient, coming out as it did almost at the church door. Nobody—not even Caroline—shared Kathryn's odd qualms.

Now she made no reply to Mrs. Lauder, beyond a nod meant to indicate that she would observe the ban on wheeled traffic. She had allowed Dandy to bicycle only as a sort of test case; if Mrs. Lauder had overlooked it, she herself would have bicycled along the path and there would not have been time to indulge in fears and fancies.

The disappointment drove from her mind her intention of leading up tactfully to the subject of the lilies. She turned to look out at them, and Mrs. Lauder's eyes rested on her with a spiteful look.

"Mrs. Lauder"—Kathryn turned to face her—"I wonder whether you would ——"

No," broke in Mrs. Lauder flatly. "No, I n't. I'm not a churchgoer, and if I were, I uldn't go into any church run by that use- wander-witted vicar." She raised a claw- hand and pointed to the garden. "Those lil s are all I've got to look at, and I like them. H s never done anything for me and he's not g ng to fill his church with my flowers. If he w nts lilies, let him grow 'em." She raised a st k and thumped it on the floor, and the n d came in. "You can go out and get some li s for old Mrs. Turk," she told her.

Kathryn was under no illusion as to Mrs. Lauder's real reason for sending flowers to M s. Turk. Deserving as the old lady was, the fl wers were sent only to underline the refusal. Mrs. Turk lived in a cottage next door to the c rch. She was nearing ninety, and had been d f and dumb from birth; now she was bed- r len—but in spite of these disabilities, she h always been a force in the village, and she s had a keen interest in everything that w it on in it. Her daughter worked in the post o ce and went across from time to time to at- d to the old lady's needs; for the rest of the d , Mrs. Turk lay surrounded by books, n spapers and magazines brought by her fre- q nt visitors; her wizened little pippin of a f e smiled up from the pillow and her sharp e missed nothing that went on round her.

Kathryn watched the maid go out on her r sion, and then took her leave. They went f ne to a scene which, by contrast with the g om of Crossways, had the look of a brightly c ored illustration of what a home should be. F ire burned cheerfully in the drawing room; f ore it, a table was laid for tea. Dandy and Alfine went upstairs to the nursery, yelling they went. Halfway up, y cannoned into their f ner; he took one of them l ler each arm and car- r l them, laughing and k king, to the top and set m down.

"You're early, darling," d Kathryn, as he came o the drawing room.

"Tea interval." Guy Hey- od drew his sister-in-law se and kissed her. "Yum," he murmured. s beautiful as my wife—but younger. Isn't beautiful, Katie?"

"Never mind her," said Kathryn. "Kiss me. you have to go out again after tea?"

"Fraid so. One of Kemp's whippets. It took a bull terrier and came off worst. . . . I've lered tea, Katie."

"Thank heaven," said Caroline feelingly. "I dragged all over the village as usual, and n hungry—and I'm tired."

"We ended up at Mrs. Lauder's," Kathryn d Guy.

"What on earth for?"

"Lilies, and we didn't get them. . . . Oh— nk you, Collier."

A large, bony woman with an impassive e marched into the room, put down the tea ngs, and stumped out again.

"'Bout turn, quick march," murmured Guy, ping himself to two of the largest scones d biting deep into one of them. "Oh"—he oke in muffled tones—"forgot to tell you. one call. The Legacy's coming down. To- rrow."

Kathryn gazed at her husband in dismay. "You mean now—while Carol's here?"

Guy, his mouth too full for further speech, dded and looked with amusement at the omy faces of his wife and sister-in-law.

"If only I'd known," said Caroline slowly, 'd have ——"

"She rang up from town," said Guy. "She esn't want to be met; she's taking a train in e morning and says she'll get a taxi to bring r out here. That saves you a journey, so eer up."

"I thought she was still in Switzerland," id Kathryn.

"No; she got back this morning," said Guy. She sounded tired. Her plane got held up in at strike in Paris."

"She wouldn't like that," commented aroline. "That wasn't tired she sounded; it as just cross. Well, I don't know about you o, but speaking entirely for myself, I'd ther have had Easter without her."

The Legacy was Guy's name for Estelle Wyatt, stepmother to Kathryn and Caroline. She lived her own life and they seldom saw her; when she came to Downsview, it was usually for a rest after a more than ordinarily gay session in London or in Switzerland, where she owned a house. It was obvious that she spent a great deal more than her husband had left her, and Guy had discovered—after some time spent in interesting speculation—that she made a comfortable income out of commissions: she carried on a lucrative one-woman business, putting those who demanded in touch with those who supplied. She was middleman—or middlewoman—for the sale of clothes, furs, houses, cars; she did her friends favors—at a price.

Guy was recalled to the present by seeing the door open and Collier marching toward him.

"Miss Parry," said Collier, in the flat accent of Lancashire.

"Mrs. Lauder's companion?" asked Kathryn, in surprise.

"Yes'm. Wants to see Mr. Heywood. Private."

"Good gracious!" said Guy. "Haven't you made a mistake, Collier? I don't think she wants to see me."

"She may," said Kathryn slowly. "It might be a complaint. Mrs. Lauder spoke to me this afternoon about Dandy bicycling along the short cut. No wheeled traffic, she said."

"Well, there's nothing private about that," commented Guy. "Show her in here, Collier."

Collier ushered Miss Parry in, and Guy rose and pulled forward a chair. Kathryn studied her curiously. It was not often that Mrs. Lauder's servants were seen outside Crossways House; they had no contact with the village and had made no friends in the neighborhood. Miss Parry fetched Mrs. Lauder's medicines from the chemist, and the maid carried flowers or fruit to old Mrs. Turk. Apart from these errands, the three inmates of the big house lived a life apart; this was the first time Miss Parry had ever done more than bring a message to the front door, deliver it and hurry back to Crossways. She looked almost haunted, Kathryn thought. She had brought into Whitewings something that had never been in the house before: a tenseness behind which lay the darker emotions—fear, and something else.

Miss Parry spoke in her low, lifeless voice. "I wanted to see you alone, Mr. Heywood. I —— Something has happened, and I would like your advice."

Guy indicated the chair once more. "Sit down," he said quietly. "If you have anything to say that can't be said in front of my wife and Miss Wyatt, I think it must be a matter somewhat outside my scope—something that Mrs. Lauder's doctor or solicitor could deal with, perhaps."

Miss Parry appeared to come to a decision. She opened her bag with shaking fingers and took out an opened letter.

"It's—it's this letter," she said. "It came this afternoon—for Mrs. Lauder. She gets begging letters from time to time, and they make her very angry. I have orders to open the letters and destroy them. So when this one came this afternoon, I saw that it was addressed in an illiterate hand and I ——" She held the letter out to Guy. "It certainly looked as though it was a begging letter."

Guy took it and studied the envelope for a few moments. "Australian stamp," he said.

"Yes. Mrs. Lauder comes from Australia; that address is the address of her solicitors—the Brisbane firm, not the London one—and I thought it must be from someone who knew her before she left Australia, and wanted to get something out of her. So I opened it."

Guy spoke thoughtfully. "Doesn't look like an illiterate hand to me; it looks as though it had been written by someone very ill—or very drunk."

"I thought it would be someone asking for money, but it—it wasn't," said Miss Parry, and her voice shook. "It's a threatening letter. Please read it, Mr. Heywood."

Guy looked at Miss Parry's haggard face and spoke gently. "You know," he said, "this isn't any business of mine. And in any case, aren't you letting it upset you too much?"

"Wouldn't you be upset"—her tone was suddenly fierce—"if you read of a threat to—to kill your employer?"

Guy stared at her for a moment. "I should be angry, and I should seek advice in the proper quarter, but I don't think I would let it . . . frighten me. The threat—if it is a threat—was made by someone a good many miles away; and in any case, it doesn't affect you."

"No?" She gave a short laugh, so rasping and bitter that Kathryn and Caroline exchanged a glance of dismay. "Will you read the letter, Mr. Heywood?"

Guy, with obvious reluctance, read it aloud: "'I got out after all. I'll find you—and you'll pay. In full.'"

There was silence. Guy folded the letter, drew his fingers absently along its fold, and handed it, with its envelope, to Miss Parry.

"'Pay in full' sounds to me like money," he said thoughtfully. "There's no threat of anything more than that."

"Yes—there is. I'm quite certain there is." Miss Parry spoke more quickly. "Mrs. Lauder is afraid of something . . . of someone. Ever since I came to work for her, I've known it. There are things that you can sense. She's a tyrant, and she's domineering—but she's got a weak spot somewhere. I've touched it, quite unwittingly, once or twice, and I've seen fear—stark fear—in her eyes. Only for a moment—then it's gone, and she makes me pay for it. If I show her this letter, she'll make my life unbearable—I want to keep it from her. But I must act; I can't ignore the threat."

"If you showed it to Mrs. Lauder and suggested the police ——"

"No." Miss Parry's voice was firm. "Not the police. Once, when there were burglaries in the village, I asked her whether I should go to the police and ask them to watch Crossways. If she had been able, I think she would hav struck me. Then she screamed at me that sh would never have the police near her house. thought you could find some way ——"

"What can I do?" asked Guy. "If someboc is coming all the way from Australia—which think is wildly improbable—in order to e tract money from Mrs. Lauder, then he or sh can only be dealt with by the law. I can assu you of one thing: that letter was not writte by anybody young, or strong. If it's any con fort to you, I promise that I shall come at onc to Crossways if you send for me—you've on got to telephone and I should be over in mi utes—but if I found anybody worrying ol Mrs. Lauder, I should call in the police a once, whether she wanted me to or not."

Miss Parry rose, and Kathryn, rising wit her, put out a hand to detain her.

"Miss Parry," she said, "we're so near yo and we would always help you if you wante us to—I mean, if you ——" She had been o the point of saying "if you were ever in an kind of danger"—but it was impossible to u ter so extraordinary a phrase. It was absur She was letting her imagination run wild.

"You wouldn't understand," said Miss Parr briefly. "None of you would understand."

Guy accompanied the visitor to the doc and they heard her footsteps going down th drive. Guy returned and he lit a cigarette.

"Odd trio over there," he remarked.

"What I hate so much," said Caroline, " to see money going to waste. Mrs. Lauder got pots and pots of it, and she could have bright house and pretty gardens, and nice pe ple to look after her."

"Well, it's her money," pointed out Katl ryn. "But I feel sorry for poor Miss Parr she'd be almost human if she could g away from those two horrible women. Esp cially that Braddock. I'd be terrified if I ha to live with her. She looks as though she think nothing of dropping tablets into you coffee."

"Then she's probably harmless," said Guy "The worst criminals look completely reassur ing. They ——" He broke off and listened "What on earth's all that row upstairs?"

"Delfine," said her mother.

"I can hear that—but why the yelling?"

"Milk," explained Kathryn. "She met child yesterday who doesn't eat enthusiasti cally, as our two do, and Delfine was so en chanted with all the fuss and pleading tha went on there—everybody on bended knee imploring it to try just a little of this or that— that now she's hoping to get some of the sam treatment."

"You mean she won't eat?"

"She eats like a horse," Kathryn told him "She's got your appetite. No; the thing is tha having eaten and drunk up everything she' given, she demands an extra cup of milk an then, having wheedled it out of Nanny promptly refuses to touch it. This is the thir time, and Nanny's calling a halt—and I don' blame her."

"What lungs!" said Guy admiringly.

The next morning, Kathryn and Caroline breakfasted alone. The children had their mea early; Guy was already out. Finishing he coffee, Caroline looked at her sister.

"Estelle will be here in a couple of hours, suppose," she said.

"Suppose so. Why don't you take Nanny and the children for a drive somewhere That'll mean you won't have to see Estell when she arrives."

"It's an idea," said Caroline gratefully. "I'l go up and tell Nanny."

"Would you do a bit of shopping for me while you're out? Collier's going out to get most of the stuff, but I said I'd choose the fruit myself. Could you get it? I want it in time for the children's lunch."

"All right."

Caroline went upstairs and announced the plan to Nanny and the children, and Nanny began to get the children ready. She was a thin sallow-faced Anglo-Indian of about forty, and had been with the family since Dandy was three and Delfine just an infant. She had been engaged when Kathryn, desperate after a series of unsatisfactory local candidates, had gone up to London to tap new sources of supply. She had gone to one of the agencies by bus-

-minute ride during which she had sat opsite a dark woman whose bright eyes and le had brought an answering one to her n lips. Wordless, they had sat taking in each er with mutual liking; then Kathryn had n to alight, and found herself walking down street a few paces behind her late traveling npanion. Still with no word spoken, they re about to enter the building when tney pped, struck by the same thought.

"Are you, by any chance ——" began thryn.

"You are going in here to ask for someone?" uired the other woman, in singsong acits. "I want a job, you know; that is what I ne for. I'm a children's nanny."

"Oh . . . I want a nanny," said Kathryn, a le breathlessly. "Perhaps we could go in d ——"

"If we go in, they'll take our fee, isn't it? is way, look how we save! Already I like ; if you like me, come!" she invited, with a ggle of her head. "We can get my box and to your house and you can give me a trial."

The admirable sense and simplicity of this posal appealed greatly to the weary thryn. They were at Whitewings in an hour, d Nanny was installed. Guy, after blenching the first sound of her voice, directed his attion to her calm, authoritative handling of children and kept his first impressions to nself. Kathryn exercised equal discretion th regard to the manner in which the latest mber of the staff had been engaged, and m that day problems from the nursery had en reduced to a minimum.

Caroline got out the station wagon and ve her little party to Downsbury, gave em ice cream and came back through the lage in order to allow nny to buy one or two ngs she needed. Then y drove home, and it s not until Caroline was tting the car into the rage that she remembred Kathryn's request fruit. It was a beautiful rning—sunny and warm d more like June than ril; she would walk to the village, she cided.

She bought the fruit and, on an impulse, deled to go the long way home. She went some stance along the road before she realized at, by this route, she would not be home in ne for the children's lunch, and she turned willingly and walked back toward the church th. A glimpse of Collier in the distance made r hopeful of handing over the fruit to be ken home while she herself continued her lk, but although she waved and signaled, llier appeared to be too far away to interet the signs. Disappointed, Caroline walked —and then she saw that she could, after all, back by a different route. By doing a little spassing, she could take the path through e bottom of Mrs. Lauder's flower garden. Being as cautious as possible, she entered e grounds, picking her way between overown bushes and hanging branches. Yes, ere she was, the old lady; it was a good thing e had been careful, she told herself. Brad ck and Miss Parry were negotiating the heel chair, with its bundled-up occupant, out nto the terrace. Caroline watched them, oosing her moment; they would turn, prestly, and bring the chair out backward, and en she would slip past and . . . now!

She darted out from her covert and, stooping a little, scuttled along the path and ached shelter at the other end. She hurried me and took the fruit to Nanny; then, going to the drawing room, she found, to her surise, that Kathryn was alone.

"Estelle not here yet?" she asked.

"Yes and no," said Kathryn. "She took a xi from Downsbury to the village and then e sent it on with her suitcases and said she as going to walk the rest of the way."

"Estelle—walk!" said Caroline in astonishent.

"Doesn't sound like her, does it? Carol"—athryn frowned—"can you remember that tter Miss Parry brought here yesterday?"

"That anonymous one? What about it?"

"Did you see what she did with it?"

"Yes. She put it into her bag and took it away with her. Why do you ask?"

"It's gone. Miss Parry came round about an hour ago—in a terrible state; she looked for it this morning and it wasn't there."

"I don't suppose she really thought she'd left it here, did she?"

"No . . . no, I don't think she did. But we looked and looked. I called Collier in and asked if she'd seen it when she was doing the room this morning—but of course it wasn't here."

"Did she say where she'd left the bag last night?"

"She puts it on a table beside her bed when she's asleep and keeps it where she can see it during the day. She was terribly upset, Carol. Somehow I got the idea that she didn't want to go back to that house. I—I offered to walk back with her."

Caroline gave her sister a glance of surprise; she knew Kathryn's repugnance for Crossways and its inmates.

"What did she say?" she asked.

"Oh, she looked at me as though I'd gone mad, and then she clutched that awful little bag close to her and rushed off without so much as a good-by." She made a little gesture of helplessness. "I've been thinking about her ever since, and wondering what it's all about. And wishing that that old woman would go away and live somewhere else."

"You mean just because you get the willies passing by those derelict stables ——"

"No. It's partly that, of course, but ever since the children have been old enough to wander about on their own, I've felt that there's been some sort of . . . danger over in those Crossways grounds. I've never dared to say that to Guy, but I'm glad I've told you. Said out loud like that, it sounds pretty silly."

"It's only nerves, you know, Katie," said Caroline slowly. "If you asked your doctor ——"

"—— for a tonic? If it's nerves, then why don't I have nerves about anything else? D'you know something, Carol? Sometimes I wake up in the middle of the night and wonder if that odd feeling I get going past the stables is a sort of . . . warning. I feel that if ever anything happened to Dandy and Delfine ——"

She paused. Caroline had walked to a cupboard and was taking out a bottle of sherry and two glasses. She filled them and handed one to Kathryn.

"Here. Sit down and relax—and drink that. Why don't you try and sift this fear you've got? Ten to one you were bitten by a horse when you were too young to retaliate, and so every time you see a stable your subconscious rears up and gives a neigh."

This homely counsel seemed to cheer Kathryn very much. She looked at Caroline with gratitude, but Caroline's eyes had gone to the long window overlooking the lawn.

"Here she comes."

Kathryn opened the window and took a step outside. "Hello, Estelle," she called.

To their astonishment, there was no familiar, brittle chatter of greeting. Estelle Wyatt came on in silence, stepped into the room and gave her stepdaughters the briefest of glances.

"Hello." She sat down heavily and removed her shoes. She said, kneading her toes slowly, "Carol, pour out another drink, will you?"

"Why did you walk?" asked Kathryn, looking with concern at her stepmother's obvious exhaustion. "You've never walked up from the village before."

"And never will again," said Estelle shortly.

She lifted her head as Caroline brought her over a drink. Fatigue—or something else—had carved deep lines round her mouth, and there were heavy shadows under her eyes. The hand that held the glass was shaking, and she seemed to have some difficulty in getting her breath. Kathryn went over to stand beside the sofa.

"Would you like to go straight upstairs and rest, Estelle?" she asked. "You could get a sleep before lunch and then you'd feel all right."

"If you leave me alone, I'll be all right in a minute," said Estelle shortly, and the two others exchanged a glance of bewilderment. Estelle's pose had always been one of graciousness; her real feelings seldom showed on the surface, and they had seldom seen her anything but poised, mistress of herself, with a hard sort of gaiety. It was no wonder, thought Caroline, that aging women took care to preserve their strength; Estelle's twenty-minute walk had made her look twenty years older.

"Stop staring at me," snapped Estelle. "If you'd both exercise elementary tact, you'd see that I'd made myself overtired and needed a few minutes in which to recover—instead of which you stand there like a couple of gaping schoolgirls and make lunatic suggestions. I know I look appalling."

"You must have been tired before the walk," said Caroline. "A short walk couldn't have got you into this state."

The last shred of Estelle's self-possession vanished. "Go away!" She glared furiously at Caroline. "Go away! I am not in a state, but I shall be if you stand there acting the idiot child. Go away!"

Caroline walked to a window seat and sat down, staring out into the garden. She had never felt affection for her stepmother, but she had admired her looks and her poise and

THE

CORNER

Lots of fun coming up in the weeks ahead. Birthdays . . . Valentine's day . . . Children's parties. Good times for quiet, constructive play with crayons. Here are some play ideas our readers have sent in.

Crayon hunt. A good game for children's parties is to hide the crayons from 8 stick boxes. Then give the children the empty boxes and the hunt is on! The first child to find all 8 colors wins a special prize. Actually everybody wins, because all the guests get to keep the crayons they have found.

Thank you notes are fun when the child draws a picture of the gift with his crayons. Children, especially those too young to write, enjoy drawing their "notes" —friends and relatives love to get them. It helps teach the habit of expressing appreciation, and develops imagination too.

Pillow case costumes are quick and easy to make. Using pinking shears, cut neck and arm holes, and trim along open end for "buckskin" effect. Kids and crayons will do the rest—cowboys, Indians, pirates—wherever their imagination leads them. To make costumes washable, set the design with a warm iron.

Birthday party idea—use an old white tablecloth, and have each guest write his or her name and the date with different colored CRAYOLA Crayons. Afterwards you can set the signatures with a warm iron, and use the cloth again next birthday. Children treasure these keepsakes.

had smiled at her affectations. This shaking, haggard woman on the sofa was a travesty of the old Estelle—but it might at last, she thought, be the real Estelle.

She heard Kathryn addressing her stepmother quietly. "I'm going to see you into bed—then you can be quiet until you feel like coming downstairs again. I'll put a hot-water bottle into your bed."

She went out, and Caroline rose and slipped out into the garden; Dandy was on his way across the lawn, and she felt that he would not be welcome at this moment in the drawing room. Having diverted him successfully, she turned to go back to the drawing room, and as she went she saw Collier enter and look round as though in search of her mistress. She was about to go out again when Caroline saw that Estelle put out a hand and stopped her. She felt no surprise—Estelle gave her orders freely when she stayed at the house, but her voice, reaching Caroline just as she was about to re-enter the room, brought her to an abrupt halt.

"I don't have to tell you that it'll be better to keep your mouth shut," Estelle said. "What's more, I'll make it well worth your while."

Collier spoke a single, scornful phrase. "Keep your money," she said, and closed the door sharply behind her.

Caroline shrank from going in and acting as though she had heard nothing. Only when she saw Kathryn return to the room did she move forward and enter it.

"Everything's ready, Estelle; let's go up," said Kathryn.

Estelle rose. "Tell them not to disturb me," she said. "I'll ring when I ——" She stopped. Guy had opened the door and was standing on the threshold. His expression was calm and his manner—Caroline thought—just as usual, but after one glance at his face, Kathryn went swiftly to him.

"Guy, what is it?" she asked.

Guy patted her hand, and then looked at his mother-in-law. "Hello, Estelle," he greeted her.

"Hello, Guy. I'm rather tired—I'm going up to rest before lunch."

"Guy, what is it?" asked Kathryn again. "Something's happened, hasn't it?"

Guy spoke quietly. "Mrs. Lauder is dead."

"But . . . she can't be!" said Caroline stupidly. "Why, I ——"

"She was in her wheel chair out on the terrace," Guy said. "The chair went over the edge and she was . . . killed."

Guy stepped forward just in time to catch Estelle as she fell unconscious.

Guy had never before had reason to be grateful to his mother-in-law, but as he laid her on her bed he felt a deep sense of thankfulness. Estelle's haggard look, her inexplicable collapse at the news of Mrs. Lauder's death—these were puzzles which for the moment he could not solve; it was enough to know that the look of horror on Kathryn's face as he broke the news was now replaced by one of anxiety for the welfare of her stepmother.

He went downstairs thoughtfully and found Caroline in the drawing room.

"Does Katie want me?"

"No; leave her," he said. "Let her do as much running about as possible for the next few hours—it'll keep her mind off this other thing. Did you see her expression?"

Caroline nodded her head slowly.

"Is she getting nervy?" Guy thrust his hands deep into his pockets and frowned with worry. "She never used to have any nerves, never showed any signs of this—this nervous imagination. Do you think she's overworked? She does a lot—runs round with the children and drives Dandy to and from school and she does most of the shopping and a good deal of the housework and it was she, not I, who insisted on getting that infernal washing machine and doing all the laundry at home. Is it all too much for her?"

"No," said Caroline without hesitation. "She loves it, and she's as strong as a horse and she'll get over all this if you give her time. I think myself that it all springs from that sort of horror she developed about the short cut through the stables."

Guy stared at her incredulously. "You don't mean to say you take that seriously? Just because she works herself into a funk about walking, in broad daylight, a few hundred yards along a ——"

"There's no funk about it," said Caroline angrily, "and the only reason I brought it up was to try and explain why the news of Mrs. Lauder's death horrified her so much. She was telling me less than an hour ago that she sensed a sort of . . . a feeling of danger and ——"

"But that sort of thing is ——"

"If you use the word 'neurotic,'" said Caroline fiercely, "I shall hit you."

He spoke in a quieter tone. "Katie's got to take a lot more bad news from Crossways before she's through."

"What sort of bad news?"

Guy slumped into a chair and leaned back wearily. "The doctor's not satisfied. He's called in the police."

"The . . . police! But—but why?" Caroline's voice was dazed.

"You call in the police when you think that there's been foul play."

"Mrs. Lauder . . . murdered!" gasped Caroline.

"Don't go too fast," warned Guy. "And don't talk. Let's all keep well out of it."

"That threatening letter ——"

Guy sat up. "What about it?"

"Miss Parry was here this morning, asking Kathryn to help her to look for it. It vanished out of her bag."

"Vanished out of her bag! When?"

"Sometime between her leaving here and getting up this morning. Who could take it—except the maid? Mrs. Lauder couldn't walk in and steal it—but Braddock could."

"Don't start conjecturing. Don't start discussing it all and going round and round in circles trying to beat the police to a solution. Try 'n' keep it out of your mind."

"That isn't so easy," said Caroline, and told him, briefly, what she had seen that morning when Collier had come into the drawing room. Guy stared at her.

"When Estelle comes down," he said, "she'll explain it all in two words."

"I suppose she will—but in the meantime all we've got to do is conjecture, so it's no use telling me not to. When Estelle goes for a walk for the first time in my knowledge of her, and then arrives at the house in a state of exhaustion, behaves like a distraught woman, hisses melodramatically at Collier when she's alone with her—and then goes down like a log when she hears Mrs. Lauder's dead . . . well, who wouldn't start conjecturing?"

Guy put up a hand, and she stopped. "Katie's coming," he said softly. "Look, Carol—don't tell her what you've just told me, will you? About Estelle, I mean."

"I wasn't going to."

Kathryn came in looking, to Guy's relief, less shaken than he had anticipated. They went in to lunch, and as soon as they had sat down, she turned to him with a calm question. "What happened to Mrs. Lauder?"

Her matter-of-fact tone reassured Guy greatly. Briefly, he told her of the doctor's suspicions, and she listened with no emotion deeper than distress.

She leaned across the table. "What did the doctor actually say to you?"

He hesitated, and then decided that a policy of openness was perhaps the best. "Mrs. Lauder had been wheeled outside and left—as she's always left on fine days—on the terrace. She can move herself about in the chair—push herself into the sun or out of it. He thought at first that she had pushed herself over the edge. The bit of stone or rock or whatever it was at the edge of the rockery gave way and the chair tilted and the old lady fell out, and the doctor thought she must have hit her head on the lower pile of stones. But when he examined her, he began to change his mind. One thing: it must have been pretty quick; she couldn't have . . . known anything."

"Yes," said Dandy, licking his ice cone.

Caroline started the engine and began the task of maneuvering. She went back and forward and back again, screwed her head round until her neck ached, tried to look sideways and backways at one and the same time. At the end of ten minutes of jockeying her position was no better and her temper was much worse.

"Are you watching, Dandy?" she called.

"Yes, Aunt Carol."

"All right then; here I come."

Crash! Backing, she hit the car behind with a thoroughness that brought a yell of triumph from Dandy.

"We hit it, Aunt Carol! We hit it!"

Caroline, lost to all feeling but fury, used the bumper of the other car to help herself out. A last wrench that made her tired arms throb, and she was free.

"Hey!"

She stopped. It was bad luck to be caught, but she felt angry enough to give as good as she got.

The man approaching her, however, was coming with a slow, leisurely tread and with no sign of anger. She saw that he was about thirty; tall, good-looking and a visitor—those were not country clothes. She eyed him cautiously, resolving to let him speak first.

He seemed in no hurry to say anything. He stood beside the car, ran his eye along it and then let his gaze rest on the car behind. It was a wordless but very eloquent look.

"Been driving long?" he inquired with an interested air.

She felt angry color rushing to her face. "Long enough," she told him. "I was taught to leave room for cars to get out."

His eyebrows went up and a slight smile appeared on his lips.

"If I've done any damage to your car, you can take my number," she said coldly. "And now, if you wouldn't mind moving aside, I'd like to go; I'm in rather a hurry."

Mommie, will I live happily ever after, too?

The fairy tale is ended. The child has finished with listening. The hard reality of a rainy afternoon drowns the little dream that the world rings with laughter alone.

There'll always be rainy afternoons, for the child and the woman she becomes. There'll be days when she'll be cut off from the outside world.

These are days for tapping an inner source, for happiness truly springs from within us.

This year nearly three million children between the ages of 7 and 15 will spend too many idle, insecure hours. But these and millions more could know the joys of frequent laughter...if every mother knew how to do more fully what she so earnestly longs to do: teach her child how to live happily. For though idleness breeds unrest, to be occupied at even the simplest task can exhilarate the body and set the restless mind at peace.

Here is one suggestion for keeping happily busy—one which 27 million children and grownups are already following. They play musical instruments. Over half of them, 19 million, like the piano best with its wide range of beautiful, tonal harmonies.

If you would give your child a recess from idleness, an escape from the unhappiness of being a "do-nothing"... if you would enrich the solitary hours and stimulate the surge of happiness that comes from within, we invite you to learn of the joys of music...we invite you to write for our free booklet, "The Parents' Primer."

"The Parents' Primer" tells you most of the things you want to know about children and music. Six or eight is old enough for beginning lessons...and the teens are young enough. And "play," not practice, is the word today. Piano teachers have discovered simplified methods that make fun out of the beginner's musical experiences. Your local teacher will be happy to tell you about them.

We urge you to make sure the piano you buy gives you everything a piano should. Compare the Acrosonic Spinet by Baldwin with all others before you decide.

Compare its exclusive Full Blow action, its lightning response. Compare its full volume—its magnificent tone. Then compare for beauty. The Acrosonic offers you a wide choice of handsome traditional and contemporary styles in the exact finish for your decor.

"Yes, I saw that." His voice was unusually attractive—low, slow and with an almost seductive quality.

"If you were watching me, you could have helped me," said Caroline angrily. "So if I hit your car it was all your fault."

"Ah; I thought we'd come round to that." His tone was still pleasant, but the undertone of mockery was more evident. Caroline glared at him.

"Will you please move aside?"

"Of course. My name, by the way, is Freeland—Avery Freeland. It's an easy name to remember."

"I'm sorry, Mr. Freeland," said Caroline slowly and distinctly, "if I damaged your car. You have only to ——"

"Oh, it isn't my car!" he told her in exaggerated surprise. "What made you think so?"

Speechless with rage, she reached for the gear lever and he got ready to jump aside. He gave her a wide, happy grin.

"Not mine," he told her in silky tones. "Oh, no! It's a police car."

"And there's a policeman coming!" yelled Dandy suddenly in joyous anticipation.

A great many withering remarks welled up and stopped just short of Caroline's tongue; she could only utter the most schoolgirl retaliation. "I—I suppose," she stammered furiously, "you think you're t-terribly amusing?"

His expression was benign. "Look," he urged, "you pop off and leave him to me. I'll deal with him."

Caroline needed no further advice; she was off, speeding up the road on the way home.

"Why didn't you talk to the policeman?" asked Dandy in disappointment. "It was Sergeant Cobb."

"Some other time," said Caroline.

She drew up at the door of Whitewings and Dandy helped her to carry the packages indoors. Kathryn came downstairs and Caroline looked at her inquiringly.

"How's Estelle?" she asked.

"About the same. I don't know what's the matter with her. I asked her if she'd let me call the doctor and she screeched at me—but if she isn't better by tomorrow, I'm going to get him in, screech or no screech. How did you get on?"

Caroline, watching Dandy giving a realistic imitation of a baboon as he went upstairs, decided to leave the matter of a few more scratches on the car for the present.

"I went to Mrs. Turk's with those things you sent," she told her sister. "Coming out, I ran into Braddock—all in black, but not in the least like mourning black, if you follow me. Katie, is it quite certain that she didn't expect Mrs. Lauder to leave her anything?"

"Yes, quite." Kathryn led the way into the dining room and began laying the table for dinner. "Miss Parry told me that the reason Mrs. Lauder paid them such high wages was because they were getting nothing when she died. Why?"

"There's a lot of talk in the village. They've all made up their minds that it's murder—and that it was Braddock."

"She looks wicked enough, but why would she kill the fleece that lays the golden eggs?"

"The goose, Katie. Well, that's what the village is trying to figure out. They feel that there's no incentive, as it were; there doesn't seem any reason why Braddock should hit the old lady on the head and bring a big salary to an end. She —— What's the matter?"

Kathryn looked as though she had overcome a sudden attack of nausea. "Hit her on the —— But I thought Guy said that the chair fell over and she ——"

"—— fell onto the stones below; well, she did, but in the village they're saying—Katie, how do these things get round so quickly?—that there were injuries to the head which weren't caused by the fall."

Kathryn stared at her sister, and the same thought was in both their minds: it was true. It was really true. An old woman had been murdered less than a mile away. Mrs. Lauder was dead, and had died in circumstances that would bring close to them, close to Whitewings, all the grim machinery of the law. Police . . . questioning . . . criminal investigation ——

"Perhaps," said Caroline at last, without conviction, "we can keep out of it all."

"That's what Guy said."

But that evening as they sat round the f the drawing room, Collier entered and Guy in her flat voice, "Two people wa speak to you, sir."

Guy looked round at her. "Who are do you know?"

"One's the policeman from Downs Sergeant Cobb, sir. Other's an inspector

One of the men was familiar to then Sergeant Cobb, from the police static Downsbury. The other was a stranger to and to Kathryn—but Caroline found h looking once again into the cool gray e Avery Freeland.

It was, Sergeant Cobb assured ther purely routine visit; presenting the insp with pride, he told them that Avery Fre had come to Downsbury for a holiday. nephew of Sir Hugh Freeland, of Downsbury Manor, he had left Scotland and official duties behind him and had down for some rough shooting over uncle's land. Sergeant Cobb's appeal ha been in vain: his holiday postponed in nitely, Inspector Freeland was now in c of what Kathryn, to her dismay, learne become known as the Lauder Case.

The two men sat down and the insp apologized for the lateness of the hour. ments had been made by Mrs. Lauder's and by her companion, Miss Parry; corro tion on one or two points was required.

Caroline watched the inspector with u ing admiration. Inspector Freeland talke behaved like any friend of the family; his tions were put quietly, and with such sn gentleness, and the answers listened to wi little appearance of anything but the ordinary attention, that Kathryn, compl disarmed and free from apprehensions, looking at the inspector with deep interes friendliness. A clever man, thought Caro Guy liked him and Katie was in his poc when she herself had stopped drawing tains and fetching ash trays, he woul doubt spray some charm in her direction expect her, too, to fall under the spell.

"Inspector," said Kathryn, "is it— quite certain that Mrs. Lauder ——"

"She was murdered," said the inspe quietly. "It was a crude murder, and a b one. She was old and helpless, and some struck her down."

"Do you mean that her wheel chair wa tually pushed over the terrace?" asked

"She was dead, in all probability, befor chair went over. And now," he continued v out pause, "perhaps you would be kind en to tell me one or two things. First: Miss P says that she called here yesterday eve about a letter that had been sent to Lauder. The letter has since disappeared

"She showed it to us," said Guy. "All tell you is what I told her at the time: it lo an educated hand, but it was shaky. Miss P took the words to be some form of phy threat, but to me it sounded more like a t of extortion—though as matters have t out, I might have spoken a bit too soon.

"Did you notice the postmark?"

"Yes. That is, no; I saw that it was Australian stamp, and I seem to remem having seen a name beginning with C-a- I'm not very sure about it. The letter had readdressed; it had been sent to ——"

"Yes," came from Kathryn. "She was, she was much more upset when she came this morning and said the letter had vanish his'll sound a bit hollow," Guy said, "but e goes: Her name's Collier and I came oss her during the war. She was cooking in army canteen, and she had a husband—of ts. He was a"—Guy paused and cleared his oat—"he was deformed and the troops d to bait him. She's rough and, as you said, un- possessing, but she's loyal through and ough. What's more important, I suppose, is t she's a first-rate cook." he inspector seemed to have some hesita- n in bringing out his next sentence.

"Are you aware," he asked Guy, "that she went to Mrs. Lauder about two months ago and asked if she could work for her?"

"Collier did?" Guy's voice held complete incredulity.

"I don't believe it," said Kathryn instantly. "Who says so?"

"Mrs. Lauder's companion says so," said the inspector gently. "An entry in an order book that Mrs. Lauder kept confirms it and puts it beyond all doubt; she instructed Miss Parry, in writing, to refuse Collier's application. Miss Parry expressed surprise at her wanting to leave you, and asked the reason; the reason your cook gave was not an unusual one: she could get almost double her present salary by working for Mrs. Lauder."

Kathryn, with greater emphasis, repeated her denial. "I don't believe it."

"It's quite easy to prove," said Guy quietly. He pressed the bell. Presently Collier entered. "Collier"—Guy spoke briefly, expressionlessly—"this is Inspector Freeland, of Scotland Yard, who wants to confirm that you went to Mrs. Lauder about two months ago and asked her to give you a job."

"February," said Collier in a voice as expressionless as Guy's. "February tenth."

"You went to ask for work," said the inspector, "and told her that you would like to leave your present position—is that correct?"

"Correct," said Collier tonelessly. "That all?"

"Not quite all. Did you see Mrs. Lauder at any time after that?"

"No."

"You never saw her again?"

"No. That all?"

"For the moment, yes," said the inspector.

Collier marched out with her curious, clumping gait. At the door she turned and directed a look toward Guy—whether of question or defiance, or triumph, nobody in the room could tell. To Caroline, who was nearest the door, the glance had a momentary look of anguish—but the next instant the door had closed behind her and Guy was left to meet the inspector's glance with a hesitant smile.

"Did you say something?" he asked.

"Yes; I said I was sorry," said the inspector.

"About Collier? That's all right. But it's an odd thing—would you understand what I meant if I said that what Collier did was . . . well, out of character?"

"Yes, I'd understand. But in my profession we see a great many people getting a great many surprises—not always pleasant. Could I speak for a moment to your children's nurse?"

"I'll fetch her," said Kathryn.

She went out and returned with Nanny, who came into the room with an expression of great surprise.

"You want to ask me some things?" she said. "You want to see my chits? I'll fetch them."

"At the moment, no," said the inspector. "I merely ——"

"They are good ones," said Nanny stoutly. "When I came to Mrs. Heywood, she didn't look; I said, 'If you want, I will show them,' but she never saw. But you can see, and they will show you that I am trustworthy. Why I left my last position is this, that I don't like anything that is not nice. Major and Mrs. Bowen, they were—he was a military gentleman and I thought he was a nice, well-behaved gentleman, but what does he do? there and I met Mrs. Heywood in the bus that time, and I have worked for her and we are very happy together, isn't it, Mrs. Heywood, madam?"

"Yes, it is, Nanny," said Kathryn.

"Mrs. Lauder was murdered, no?" asked Nanny.

"Yes, Nanny," said Guy. "If you could keep the children away from ——"

"Dandy told me," said Nanny.

"Dandy!" Kathryn's face was a picture of horror. "How in the world did ——"

"Basil Wilkinson told him. Why do you worry?" asked Nanny with perfect calm. "These little chaps, they know everything, but what do they understand? Nothing. They repeat just like parrots, and if you get shocked then they say to themselves, 'Oh-ho, this is something they don't want me to know'—and they take care to find out. But when he told me, I said, 'Go on, you silly boy, everybody knows all that already'—calm, like that, and then I told him, 'Go; go wash your hands, so dirty they are'—and that way, everything is so natural, they don't think about it any more."

"Were you out with the children this morning?" asked the inspector.

"I took them for a walk, but I didn't go to the village. I went up Dimmock Hill, where Delfine likes to walk."

"You didn't pass Mrs. Lauder's house?"

"No; Dimmock Hill isn't that way," explained Nanny. "When it was time, then we came home for tiffin."

"Thank you, Nanny; that's all." The inspector smiled his gratitude, but Nanny showed no disposition to move.

"You are here to find out who-all did this thing, isn't it?" she asked soberly.

"I am."

"Then if I tell you something I saw, perhaps it will help you a little bit."

"What is it, Nanny?" asked Guy.

"Everybody," said Nanny slowly, "says that that maid of Mrs. Lauder's is a bad hat—and I think so too. But I don't think that it Miss Parry is so good as she tries to make t. Something I can tell you that I saw with y own eyes this morning. She came here to k about this letter she said she had lost."

You said, 'Please tell Miss Parry come in and see us whenever she wants t and I turned round to tell her that. But Del had run outside onto the drive when my b was turned, and when I looked, I saw M Parry going up to her, with her hands held just like this"—Nanny curved her fingers i a curiously sinister, clawlike shape, and Ka ryn's cheeks paled. "My heart went like a thing," went on Nanny, "and I was just go to call out before she touched little Delfin but she heard me coming and she turned ro to me and gave me such a look! It made y blood crawl! She looked so awful, creeping to Delfine. I didn't see her face, but I saw going up to her—but I wouldn't have let hurt her. I was going to pick up some sto and throw them."

"Why didn't you mention this to M. Heywood earlier?" asked the inspector.

"Because just when I was going to tell h the taxi came."

"Taxi?"

"My stepmother's taxi from Downsb station," explained Kathryn.

"Yes. So I took the suitcases, because C lier was out and ——"

"One moment. This was when you saw in the village?" the inspector asked Carol

"Yes."

The inspector glanced at Sergeant Co and the latter added the item to the notes was making.

"Yes?" The inspector turned to Nanny.

"Then I said to myself that I would Mrs. Heywood later on—but then afterwa when Mrs. Wyatt arrived, I ——"

"But was Mrs. Wyatt not in the tax asked the inspector.

"No; she was walking from the village, a when I saw how worried Mrs. Heywood about her, I ——"

"One moment." Once again the inspecto voice pulled Nanny up in full flight. He turn to Kathryn.

"You were worried about your stepmother he asked.

"Not really worried," Kathryn answere "She isn't a person who takes much exerci and it exhausted her, that's all."

"So then with all this fainting and what-a I didn't say anything," ended Nanny.

"Will you tell me what time your ste mother arrived?" the inspector asked Kathry

"I ——" Kathryn's eyes went to her sist "Caroline, can you remember?"

"Yes. It was very shortly before you ca home, Guy," said Caroline.

"I was in at about half past twelve," s Guy.

"I see. Then Mrs. Wyatt," said the insp tor slowly, "walked up to the house from t village between twelve and half past twel this morning?"

The inspector had risen. Guy got up, a the sergeant, with a sigh, heaved his tub form out of his chair.

"It's too late to disturb Mrs. Wyatt t night," said the inspector, "but perhaps you allow me to come and have a word with h in the morning?"

His acceptance was unhesitating; Caroli noticed that it had grace, and charm, a gratitude. Revising her original estimate Avery Freeland, she erased the word "attra tion" and substituted "magnetism."

The telephone bell rang, and Guy move away to answer it.

"Got to go out," he told his wife at the en of the brief call. "I'll try not to make it t late. . . . Someone's in trouble over tw

'What did you say?" he asked in astonish-

"I was only trying it over, just to see what it sounded like."
"But ——"
"It sounds nice," decided Kathryn, and tried it over again. "Caroline Rosetta Freeland."

Caroline was wakened early the next morning by the sound of her name being called softly from below her window.
"Miss Wyatt . . . Miss Wyatt!"
She slipped out of bed and went to the window. Below stood Miss Parry, and in her arms she held a huge bunch of lilies.
Caroline put on a dressing gown, glancing as she did so at the clock on her table; it was not yet seven o'clock. Wondering at the untimeliness of the visit, she went downstairs and through the hall. The front door had already been unlocked by Collier; Caroline opened it and looked at the visitor.
"Please come in," she said.
"No, no, no!" Miss Parry's face looked blue and chilled. She thrust the flowers into Caroline's arms. "These are for the church. She did so little good in her lifetime, and I thought . . . a sort of offering on—on her behalf. I didn't want Braddock to see me. Will you give the flowers to Mrs. Heywood, please?"
Caroline drew her firmly into the house and led the way to the small, warm study. Faintness, or fatigue, prevented the visitor from making protests, and she seemed only too glad to sink into the comfortable chair that Caroline drew forward.
"The flowers are lovely, and my sister will be very grateful—but you shouldn't have done this. You must have been up at dawn!"
Miss Parry's weary eyes rested on her; Caroline saw that she was trembling.
"Coffee," she said firmly. "You sit there and rest; I'll go and find Collier and ask her to make some."
Miss Parry said nothing; when Caroline returned she found her sitting in the same position and looking frighteningly pale. Some of the dislike Caroline had felt evaporated in pity.

"You're upset," she said. "I know it must be a dreadful experience and ——" She paused and then continued impulsively, "Miss Parry, perhaps I shouldn't say this, but I don't understand how you could have gone on working so long for someone who—who ——"

"Money," said Miss Parry. "When I came to her I had been . . . unfortunate, and she offered me three, four times what I could have got anywhere else. She said to me, 'You'll earn it'—and I know now what she meant. Sometimes I used to wonder whether she would drive me too far. I was putting away almost all my salary, and I knew that if I could go on for a time, I could leave her. So that was why I stayed with her." Miss Parry raised hopeless eyes and gazed at Caroline. "Now she's dead, but it isn't over, as I thought it would be. It's only the beginning." She shuddered. "This isn't the first time I've been through this. I know what we're all in for—only too well."

Caroline found herself stammering. "You mean . . . you d-don't mean ——"

"Death—and the rest. The inquest, the suspicions, the questions, the whispers, the cross-examinations, the same, same inquiries. I've been through it all once before—I don't think I can bear to go through it again!"

"Someone you knew was—was ——"

"Murdered." The word was a whisper. "That's what they said. I was housekeeper to an old man and he . . . died. It was an accident, but I was—there was nobody in the house but myself. Rumors flew about. If they had been able to put their finger on any possible motive . . . but they couldn't. They could prove nothing, and they had to let me go. I thought that if I came to a new place, with a new name—but you can't run away from the past. Only—I can't stand it all over again. I can't!"

"But, Miss Parry ——"

"They know it all, you see." She got up and walked to the window and stared out into the garden. "The inspector knows. I would have told him, but before I could tell him, he told me. I don't know how the police find out things—old things, forgotten things—but they do find out. And they don't tell you what they're thinking—but you know."

The door opened and Collier came in with the coffee. She placed the tray beside Caroline and went out again. Miss Parry said in a whisper, "I suppose she knows that I had to tell the police that she came to see Mrs. Lauder?"

"Yes, she knows. When all this is over," she asked Miss Parry, "what will happen to Crossways?"

"I don't know. It's left, with everything else, to Mrs. Lauder's nephew. I don't think she ever corresponded with him; once, when the solicitor from London came down to Crossways, he gave me to understand that they had quarreled—Mrs. Lauder and her nephew—before she left Australia. Certainly throughout the years I worked here, Mrs. Lauder never wrote to anybody in Australia but her solicitors—and never heard from anybody there."

"Did you ever find that letter you lost?"

"No." Miss Parry put down her empty cup and rose to her feet. "I didn't expect to find it."

Caroline went to the door with her and stood staring after her thoughtfully. Then she went upstairs and, dressing quickly, joined Kathryn in the dining room.

"Hello," Kathryn greeted her. "Collier says Miss Parry brought those lilies."

"She said it was an offering on Mrs. Lauder's behalf. Where's Guy?"

"He went out early—without breakfast." Kathryn sighed. "I think he wanted to put off having to face Collier. It's fantastic, Carol! I still can't believe it!"

"I know it's a blow, but ——"

"But she was happy here! You probably don't know, because you don't see her all the time—but I tell you she was absolutely happy. So why should she suddenly walk across to Mrs. Lauder and propose working for her? Why? I'm certain she loathed her."

"Miss Parry loathed her too. Yet she ——"

"If it was money, why couldn't she have asked Guy? Or me?"

"Perhaps she felt she owed you too much already. Leave it, Katie; it's no use searching round for reasons. Money seems to do terrible things to people."

"I don't feel it was money—I'm sure there was some reason."

Caroline finished her breakfast and glanced at her watch. "Ten past nine. What about Estelle?" she asked. "Will she be down, or does she want breakfast in her room?"

"In her room—but not early," Kathryn told her. "She said she'd have coffee and toast about half past ten."

"I'll see to it. But there's lots of time yet."

"When you do go up with the tray, tell her the inspector wants to talk to her, will you?"

"Didn't you tell her last night?"

"No. But she'd better get up and see him when she's had her breakfast."

"Would you like me to take the lilies to the vicarage?" Caroline asked, as she and Kathryn rose from the table.

"We'll both go. I've got some shopping to do; tomorrow's Good Friday and the shops won't be open—and I want to order some hot cross buns." She stared with wide, troubled eyes at her sister. "Hot cross buns," she murmured. "Isn't it ghastly, Carol? A murder over there—and hot cross buns here. Lilies for the church, and all of us singing 'Christ the Lord is risen today' . . . and lilies on her coffin."

"Don't get too close to it."

"Close to it?" Kathryn echoed. "How c we help getting close to it? We haven't move we're just where we were—but it's movi closer to us!"

"Well then, don't brood too much about Forget it."

"I'll try. But it won't be easy to forget i She sighed. "Well, I'm going to see the ch dren. Will you get the car out?"

Caroline went to the garage to back t station wagon out. Her mind was not on t task; the car scraped the side of the door.

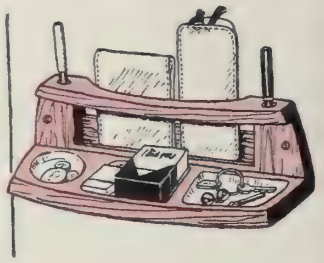
"Gently, gently," said a voice that Caroli had no difficulty in recognizing. "Would y like me to get the car out for you?"

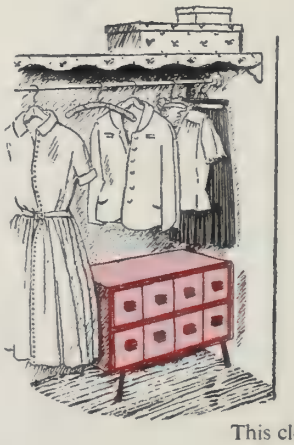
10 ways to improve Closets

Closets crowded? These ideas will stretch that space.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor of the Journal

To bring order out of chaos in a wardrobe closet sometimes calls for only a few more accessory shelves, an extra hat compartment or a rod of spacesaving height, as we illustrate. None of these ideas is costly; all make your storage units count for more. There's only one rule to remember: the most reachable space should go to the items most frequently used.





In man's closet, two-level rod holds jackets and trousers (these, 48″ from floor except in case of very tall men) together with coats and bathrobes (hung 63″ high). For shoe shelves, allow space 7″ wide, 6″ high for women's pair, 9″ wide and 6″ high for men's.

Valet shelf 12″ long—for men only. Why not a pocket-unloading shelf with space for keys, billfold, watch and all? A door holds it.

Woman's closet with staggered rods holds long clothes (rods 70″ from floor), medium (rods 60″ high), and skirts and blouses (rods 45″). Big advantage: more shelves. Generally, allow 1½″ of rod space for blouse, 2″ for dress or suit.

This closet chooses a storage case under skirts and blouses. When all short clothes are hung together, an 8-drawer shoe cabinet goes in neatly. Unpainted chests are an alternate idea under blouses.

thered from something she said last at she had some sort of dread of walk- e village by the short cut through the Is that really so?"

"Yes, it is. But she's not a nervous person as a rule. It just happens that ——"

"Will you come with me now," he asked, "and show me exactly where she has this feeling of dread? It won't take more than a moment or two."

Caroline stared at him with a puzzled frown. "I don't see what this has to do with—with what you're here for," she said.

"In my job," he told her, "you don't walk straight up to facts you already know. You—as it were—walk round them. It gives you an all-way view. And so"—he opened the door, waited for her to get out, and then turned her gently in the direction of the short cut—"I wanted to find out something about why your sister—who struck me as having singularly good nerves—should feel ——"

"She isn't at all disposed to fears," said Caroline, walking beside him. "But this just happens to be a gloomy sort of path and she—in some way she let it get on her nerves. Haven't you been along it yet?"

"Several times. Is it here that your sister feels frightened?"

"No. She can look over her shoulder and see her own house from here, and that reassures her. Then this little wooded bit isn't too bad. It's here"—she came to a standstill—"it's just about here that she feels a bit creepy; and personally," she added, with a touch of aggressiveness, "I don't blame her."

He made no answer and Caroline found with something close to chagrin that, having walked her to this spot, the inspector appeared to have forgotten her. His eyes were going round the stableyard, but his expression was that of a man who is thinking of something else. Something here had caught his attention and he was weighing it, examining it. She shivered, and the movement brought the inspector's eyes to rest on her inquiringly.

"Let's go back," she said impulsively.

They turned and he looked down at her.

"What do you do in London?" he asked surprisingly.

She looked up inquiringly. "You mean you haven't got it all on a what's-it—a dossier?"

"Well . . . certain facts. Sister to Mrs. Heywood. Twenty-eight."

"Four," said Caroline, and could have bitten out her tongue.

"Thank you. Twenty-four. Tallish, darkish . . . prettyish." His eyes mocked her. "Lives in London; works in London; does we know not what, but are now endeavoring to find out."

"This and that," said Caroline. "Do you like being a detective?"

"Very much. It's nice, open-air work—as a rule. It's varied, it's challenging and sometimes it's even dangerous. Sometimes it's both dangerous and pleasant—as at this moment. Are you engaged, Miss Wyatt?"

"Look on the dossier, inspector."

"If you were, I doubt whether your fiancé would let you spend the Easter holidays without him. Moreover, you would wear a ring. Moreover, he would crop up in conversation. So no fiancé. Good."

"What's good about it? I'm twenty-four; no fiancé, bad." She stopped at the car. "We're going to the village—can we take you there?"

"No, thank you. What time will you be back? I want to see your stepmother."

"I'm taking her breakfast up at half past ten. Any time after that."

She left him with the curious feeling that he was waiting for something—watching. Then she put the thought from her: inspectors did not do their own shadowing; they placed men where they needed them. But the feeling persisted, and she decided not to mention the meeting to Kathryn.

They went to the village and divided the shopping list; having completed their purchases, they drove toward the vicarage to deliver the flowers, but as they went they saw the stout figure of Miss Burnley rolling—there was no other word for her walk—down the street. Kathryn stopped the car to speak to her.

"We've got the lilies," she said. "I'm just on my way to the vicarage with them."

Miss Burnley, as usual, was having trouble with her hat.

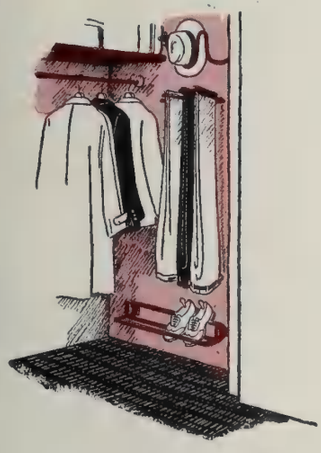
"All those!" she exclaimed in delight, peering into the car. "My dears, they're magnificent! However did you ——"

"Miss Parry brought them over."

"Oh, I see. Well, it was a good deed." Miss Burnley nodded. "I was on my way to see you, this very minute. Did you see the Downsbury paper? Headlines. Death in mysterious circumstances. And something about a letter—did you know anything about a letter?"

"Well, yes," said Kathryn. "Miss Parry came ——"

"Look here, don't you bother to go to the vicarage. I'll go back now and send Stokes to the church to meet you; he'll take the flowers and put them with all the others. Give him a moment or two, will you? He's working in the garden and I might be some time getting hold of him. Thank you very much for bringing the flowers. Are you going to come along on Saturday to help with the decorations?"



"I'll come," said Caroline.

"Good girl. Saturday at about three o'clock. That's day after tomorrow. Well, I must go. It's beginning to drizzle. I'll send Stokes to the church. Good-by!"

"I like her," said Caroline thoughtfully, as they drove on, "but I'd hate to be the vicar."

They went into the church, Kathryn carrying the lilies carefully. The verger was some time in coming, but they waited without impatience;

Closet accessories for men here. Hat holders, swinging trouser clamps that fasten to the wall, adjustable shoe racks add utility. One or more of these can go on inside of door if closet is deep enough. Otherwise, walls work.

Dust protectors: a tiered hatbox with a zippered front, and garment bags of various sizes. When choosing bags for woolens, look for sturdy material with all openings covered to deter moths. Best avoid plastic hangers when moth crystals are used—some stain from a chemical reaction.

A door does a big bit here. Shallow shelves such as a carpenter or home handy man can build will unblock many a storage crisis. Stool inside is for reaching high shelves. With a handle—you won't even have to bend to pick it up.

A sliding rack for hangers is the solution for a shallow closet that can't hold clothes at right angles to wall. This idea serves well for narrow spaces found in old homes. Rack saves sideways jamming, glides forward to bring garment.

Built-in drawers can fit to order. A new seamless plastic drawer comes in two widths, two heights, and tracks are available for easy rolling. A home handy man or carpenter builds the frame. Inside, dividers can separate your small items. Also available: a plastic drawer liner, of standard drawer size, sturdier than paper.

Twenty past ten."

"Then I'll take up Estelle's tray before starting on anything else."

She carried the tray upstairs and knocked gently. There was no reply, but Caroline, going in, found that her stepmother was sitting up in bed. Estelle still looked ill. There seemed, however, almost all the old decision in her voice when she spoke.

"Thanks; bring up the newspapers, will you, if everybody's done with them."

"I will. How're you feeling?"

"Terrible, and I wish I'd never come." She sipped a cup of coffee. "I'm going back to town, and I'd like to catch the one-forty."

"Will you be down fairly soon? The inspector said he'd be along this morning—he'd like to talk to you. He said he'd ——"

Caroline stopped abruptly. Her stepmother's face was ashen. Her eyes were wide and dark with fear.

"What inspector?" she gasped.

"Sergeant Cobb and an inspector called last night," said Caroline, struggling to keep uneasiness from her voice. "He said he'd like to see you this morning if ——"

BUT WHAT WAS BEAUTY?

By ELIZABETH COATSWORTH

Deep bowed the branches with the snow, and deep the silence lay,
the sun moved golden-sleeved and slow across the woods that day.

The only things that stirred at all were shadows, flower-blue, and chickadees sang from a wall where dark the pine trees grew.

But what was beauty, soft and strange,
in which I had no part?
the bright, the white, delightful change unmirrored in my heart?

"Who dared to bring me into this?" demanded Estelle shrilly.

Caroline spoke quietly. "There's no need to get upset, Estelle."

"I am not upset." Her eyes glittered with anger. "I'm furious. How dare you—how dare any of you drag me into this?"

"We didn't ——"

"Then why should this inspector say he wanted to talk to me?"

"It was simply that you happened to be near Crossways ——"

She stopped. She wondered what would happen if she altered the sentence; if she told her that she had overheard her exchange with Collier. Then she pulled herself up sharply: she was allowing herself to imagine too much. There was no reason for supposing that Collier had seen anything that could connect Estelle with the dreadful affair of Mrs. Lauder's death.

"I am going to get up," said Estelle in the same shrill voice. "I'm going to pack, and when I'm ready I shall ring up a taxi and go to the station and I shall not wait for any of your interfering inspectors. This business has nothing whatsoever to do with me and nobody is going to drag me into it."

"But Estelle, you ——"

"Get out!" spat Estelle.

Caroline closed the door quietly behind her; she was feeling slightly sick. She had sometimes seen Estelle off her guard—but she had never before caught a glimpse of the haggard woman she had just left in the bedroom. Remembering the fear in Estelle's eyes, she stopped in the hall to consider it, to try to account for it; then she walked slowly and thoughtfully into the study, where she found Kathryn dusting bookshelves.

"I took Estelle's tray up," she told her. "She says she's going to take the first train back to town. But if the police say they want to ask you questions, you can't just skip off."

"She's not connected with the case."

"She passed the scene of the murder at the time of the murder—that connects her with the case. At least, that's what the inspector seemed to think."

"You look a bit shaken. Did she put all the blame on you?"

"No—not exactly. But she behaved—to say the least of it—very violently. She's . . . I don't understand what's the matter with her."

"Well, don't worry; Guy'll fix her. He's in."

"He is?" The relief in Caroline's voice made her sister's eyes rest on her speculatively.

"Yes. He's just had a bath and he'll be down in a minute. Take these up to the nursery, will you?" She handed a pile of books to Caroline. "They don't belong in here."

When Caroline came downstairs, Guy and Kathryn were in the drawing room. "Not until she's seen the inspector, she isn't," Guy was saying firmly. "What's all the fuss about anyway? All she's got to do is ——" He broke off. "Well, here's the inspector, anyhow, so that clinches it."

He opened the window to admit the inspector, who was coming across the lawn from the direction of Crossways. He made a habit, thought Caroline, of appearing at the right place at the right moment.

"Come in," said Guy.

"Thank you." The inspector came into the room with slow, easy movements; Kathryn smiled up at him and he looked from her fresh beauty, her pink-and-whiteness and dazzling skin, to the taller, darker beauty standing in the shadows of the room.

"Good morning," she said, and he smiled.

"This is an early visit," he told them, "but I wasn't sure what time Mrs. Wyatt wanted to leave. I didn't want to hold her up."

"She's leaving almost at once," said Kathryn, and added ingenuously, "I don't think she's very keen on talking to you."

He seemed to be listening. Nobody else heard a sound, but the inspector glanced at Guy and the latter went to the door and threw it open.

"Oh—hello, Estelle," he said a little blankly.

Estelle, brought up short in the middle of her stealthy progress from the stairs to the front door, put down her suitcase and did her best to look casual.

"Hello, Guy," she said. "I'm sorry to run away like this, but I have to get to town and see my own doctor. I've rung up for a taxi and he'll be here in a moment. Will you get my other case down for me?"

"Surely," said Guy. "But come in here for a minute; this is Inspector Freeland. Inspector, Mrs. Wyatt. He wants to ask you one or two things, Estelle, but it probably won't take long."

Estelle's bow to the inspector was cool, but she seemed completely at ease. Caroline looked at her; it was fantastic to imagine that she could have had anything to do with Mrs. Lauder's violent end, but when Guy opened the door, she had been giving a convincing imitation of a woman on the run . . . and the inspector had expected her to run, and had known how to prevent her from leaving until she had answered his questions. Things were coming close indeed.

Estelle was looking at the inspector with a polite, hard little smile. "I'm sorry I haven't been well enough to see you before," she told him. "I arrived yesterday in what I can only describe as a state—didn't I, Kathryn? I'd traveled nonstop from Switzerland." She sat down gracefully and lit a cigarette. "I haven't a great deal of time, inspector. Or do I have to wait until you give me permission to go?"

"There are just one or two things I'd like to check up on, Mrs. Wyatt. You walked up here yesterday morning and passed Crossways between twelve and half past twelve; is that correct?"

"Perfectly."

"Did you come by the main road?"

"No; I came by the path through Mrs. Lauder's garden."

"Is that your usual way of coming here?"

"Not at all. I had something to say to Mrs. Lauder, and it seemed a good idea to walk up to Crossways. It was such a fine day, I thought it likely that Mrs. Lauder would be outside, so that I could stop and talk to her."

"Did you see anybody as you went through the grounds?"

"Yes, I did. I saw my stepdaughter's cook, Collier."

The inspector seemed to be waiting.

"Now you can understand why I wasn't anxious to talk to you. I knew that I should have to bring Collier into it. One hates to implicate people."

"Yes. Will you tell me," asked the inspector, "what you wanted to say to Mrs. Lauder?"

"Perhaps I can begin at the beginning," suggested Estelle.

"Please."

"It so happens that I knew Mrs. Lauder. It was through me that she came to hear of Crossways; I arranged the sale of the house."

"Yes; I know that."

"How do you know that?" demanded Estelle.

"From Mrs. Lauder's papers, and also from her solicitor, who came down from London and is at Crossways at the moment."

"The truth was that I wanted the house Mrs. Lauder owned in Switzerland but I had no hope of her ever moving out of it. Then one day, she told me that she had decided to spend the rest of her life in England, and asked me to advise her about neighborhoods and so on. She wanted somewhere fairly remote, and what could be more remote than Downsview? So I came over and found Crossways; she bought it and I bought her house. If I hadn't bought it —— Can I have another cigarette, Guy?"

"If you hadn't bought it ——" prompted the inspector, lighting it for her.

"—— then I shouldn't have had the horrible experience I had two days ago . . . and I wouldn't have ——" She looked round blindly and stubbed out her newly lighted cigarette, and then went on speaking in a hurried way. "I had a visit from a man—a man so skeletonlike and so ghastly looking that ——"

Caroline's glance met Kathryn's; in both pairs of eyes was a look of uneasy remembrance. Estelle was hurrying on.

"He was a walking ghost," she said. "He asked me if I knew where Mrs. Lauder was living. He had traced her as far as Lausanne; as I'd bought the house, he thought it was pretty certain I'd know where she'd gone to."

"You gave him the address?" asked the inspector.

"Not at first. I asked him why he wanted it—and then he told me that he was Mrs. Lauder's nephew and that his name was Kenneth Lauder."

Caroline tried to speak, but Estelle swept on.

"He produced a passport and some papers which seemed to prove that he was speaking the truth, and so I told him where Mrs. Lauder lived. Then I saw an expression on his face that—that horrified me. I felt sure that I oughtn't to have told him where to find her—that he intended doing her some kind of harm. I thought I could warn her—say something to put her on her guard. That's why I went to see her, and ——"

"And you saw her," said the inspector quietly, "but she was dead."

She looked at him, her face gray. "Yes. The—the chair was overturned, and her hands were out and ——" She broke off and shuddered violently. "I found myself running—running away, but then I stopped and made myself go back. If she had been unconscious, I would have got help. But she wasn't. I got frightened and decided that the best thing I could do was to say nothing; to keep out of it. So I—I left her there and I came away."

"And it was then, I think, that you saw Mrs. Heywood's cook?"

"Yes. She was standing still, just looking at me. I didn't know how long she'd been there, but she must have seen me as I—as I went back and looked at—at the body."

"Did you speak to Collier?"

"No. Before I got to her, she turned a[nd] walked away."

"And you came straight to this house?"

"Yes—but you can see how difficult thi[s] were for me. If I said anything, I would h[ave] to say that I had seen Collier. I thought ab[out] it all last night, and decided that I'd go aw[ay]. But you came too early—and now I've had [to] tell you."

"Thank you. But there were one or t[wo] other things. Mrs. Wyatt, I think I'm rig[ht]—am I not, in saying that you owed M[rs.] Lauder a somewhat large sum of money?"

There was a long pause. Estelle was star[ing] at him, surprise, fury and something el[se] something like fear, showing on her face.

"I owed her some money; yes. Well?"

"You bought her house, I believe, on [an] agreement that gave you some years to p[ay] the full amount?"

"Yes."

"But you had made no payment for s[ix] seven years and she had become, lately, a l[ittle] tle impatient?"

"She was never impatient. She was alwa[ys] unpleasant."

"It was not on account of her . . . unple[a]antness that you came over to England to s[ee] her?"

"No, it was not." She went on angrily, "I think this interference in my private affa[irs] goes a good deal beyond your ——" [She] ended more quietly, "If I'd told you simp[ly] that I had got out of the taxi and walked here, you'd have known nothing about ——"

"You were seen in the garden by more th[an] one person yesterday morning, Mrs. Wyat[t]."

She gave him a long, incredulous stare. "I don't believe you," she said flatly, at last.

"Miss Parry saw you; she had gone in[to] the house to telephone to the doctor. She [saw] you go up to the body ——"

"I told you that I did."

"—— and stoop down and take a pap[er] from the dead woman's hand."

Estelle was on her feet; she tried to speak but before she could find words the inspector's voice was heard again—and though it was quiet and emotionless, Caroline found noth[ing] ing in the least reassuring about it.

"You knew, I think, Mrs. Wyatt," he said "that Kenneth Lauder had very good reason to hate his aunt?"

"I —— You're trying to frighten me," said Estelle in a whisper. "You're trying ——"

"You knew, did you not, that Mrs. Lauder had changed her residence from time to time with the purpose of making it impossible for him to trace her? But you gave the address to him—and then you came to England to ——"

"I wanted to warn her!"

"Your plane was delayed in Paris, was it not?"

"It—I don't ——" She was so white and shaken that Guy and Kathryn moved instinctively to her side.

"It's all right, Estelle," Guy said gently, and turned to the inspector. "Look ——"

"There's nothing more—at present," the inspector told him soberly. "I think Mrs. Wyatt ought to rest."

Estelle walked between Guy and Kathryn to the door, clinging to the two others as they went slowly upstairs.

The inspector's eyes met Caroline's. "And sometimes," he said, "the job's far from pleasant."

"You . . . frightened her."

"You can't frighten people so easily unless they're hiding the truth from you."

"Some of the things she said—they were quite true," said Caroline. "About that man ——"

"Which man?" The inspector was looking at her with narrowed eyes.

"The one she told you about—Kenneth Lauder. We saw him—Kathryn and I."

"You ——" He spoke with urgency. "Where and when—quickly, please."

"We met him on the road at about half past ten—no, twenty past. He stopped the car and asked the way to Crossways. But he looked terribly ill and so Kathryn offered him a lift and he got in the car. We put him down at the beginning of the lane and —— Where are you going?"

"To find Lauder." The inspector was openg the long window. "But—thanks to that
't you gave him—I think I'll find him . . .
o late."

Caroline stood for some minutes staring at ie lawn over which the inspector had just one with such desperate speed, and tried to ollect her thoughts. She remembered the exression Avery Freeland had worn as he left er. Why should the fact of their having given Irs. Lauder's nephew a lift make the inspector ok like a man whose plans were in ruins?

Suddenly, she knew that she must find out.
ie ran out through the back door and went viftly down the path toward the stables.

She stopped on the path and drew a deep reath, fighting to control a rising and inexicable panic; it rose slowly, inexorably, and ie heard her heart thumping loudly. There as nothing to fear, she told herself hardily.
ie had allowed herself to become overexcited id if she met the inspector when she was in is state of childish terror, he would take er for a hysterical idiot. She had allowed the ought of Crossways to loom too large in er mind; she had brooded over it too much id too long and invested it with a quite exagerated evil.

Then, with an even greater terror, she underood that she was—as Kathryn had always een—affected by something here, on this ot; she was starkly afraid of passing the ables. She had dealt gently with her sister's ars, but she had never understood them—ow she understood only too well.

She could hear nothing, see nothing to ighten her, but a sense of danger filled her id weighted her feet to the round.

She made herself walk as ir as the cobbled yard, and ien paused to listen. The ioments passed and she eard nothing but the beatig of her own heart—and ien all at once she knew iat there had been a move-ient deep in the blackness f the disused buildings.

With certainty came a measure of courage.
'aroline took a step forward and stared into ie dark doorway. Her nerves were now eady and she was thinking clearly. There 'as somebody in there, and she knew that she ust find out who it was—or what it was.
he was frightened, but she was also angry;
ow, deep, unaccustomed rage was rising in er, and soon it ousted her fear.

Someone was in there—something. Kathryn ad heard it without knowing that she had one so—and so her fear had been born. She, 'aroline, was going in there to look. Any-ing was better than ignorance.

She paused a moment to remind herself iat this might be a stray cat—or it might be a ouse—or a rat—or a bat.

At the entrance, she spoke; her clear young oice held no note of wavering. "Is anybody here?"

She had not expected an answer, and none
ame. She took a step forward. And then ourage and resolution were swept away by a ood of terror as she felt herself seized by the rm and jerked forward. Her scream, high nd piercing, was stifled by a hand over her outh and the next instant she was flung oughly against the damp stone floor. Behind er there was a scuffle and the sound of footeps—then silence.

She was on her feet in a moment, but the ll had been heavier than she knew. She ood, swaying, while a full knowledge of hat might have happened to her in this black nterior gripped her and swept away the last hred of self-control. She found herself run-ing, not homeward, but on toward Cross-ays, her breath coming in gasps, her eyes trained for the sight of Avery Freeland.

Then she saw him coming toward her, and he ran straight into his arms. He held her, nd looking beyond him, she saw Sergeant obb running, panting, to reach them. Shakng and breathless, she clung to the inspector.
le held her firmly, and presently one of his ands went to her hair and stroked it gently.
Not until her trembling ceased did he loose her clinging hands and, holding her away from him, look anxiously into her face.

"What happened?" he asked.

"I ——" Caroline made an effort to speak coherently. "I was coming to see you; you frightened me by what you said about that man, and I wanted to ask you what we had done when we gave him a lift. But as I was passing the stables, I heard . . . there was something. A—a movement."

"And you screamed. We heard you."

"No—not then. I—I went to the door and called out and nobody answered, and so I—I went in to look ——"

"My holy aunt," said Sergeant Cobb, awed.

"What happened?" It was the inspector's voice.

"I took a step inside ——"

"Go on," said the inspector grimly.

"And someone caught hold of my arm and dragged me in and I screamed and then I was pushed onto the —— I ——"

"Did you hear anything after that?"

"Yes. Someone ran away."

"Do you know in what direction?"

"No. I just heard the footsteps on the cobbled part."

He was silent for a moment. "How do you feel?" he asked at last.

"I'm—I'm all right. I lost my nerve for a bit, that's all."

"You're mad," he informed her without emotion. "You're certifiable; insane. Even a poor devil of a half-wit would have known that whoever was hiding in that stable was dangerous . . . homicidal. With murder on your very doorstep, you go deliberately into ——" He stopped, but the look he exchanged with Sergeant Cobb expressed more than words could have done.

"I had to come." Caroline had regained her self-possession. "I had to come and ask you why you were worried about that man. You said you might have been too late and ——"

Something in the faces of the two men made her pause. Her eyes went from one to the other and then, as she glanced beyond them, the sergeant took a step forward and blocked from her view something on the edge of the bushes. But the glimpse had been enough; the blood drained from her face and she gave a deep, shuddering sigh.

"No," she said under her breath. "No—oh, no!"

"I was too late. I'm sorry I said what I did—but I knew ——"

"He's . . . dead."

"Yes. Don't look; it isn't a pretty sight. We found him a short while ago." He took her hand in a firm clasp. "You needn't worry about your part in it," he told her with odd gentleness. "You couldn't know that it could possibly have any bearing on ——"

"When he made for Crossways, Miss Wyatt, he was walking straight into a death trap," said the sergeant. "He was expected, you see."

"And all you have to think of now," said the inspector, "is that you've just had a very lucky escape. That scream probably saved your life. He knew we were about, you see; he knew that we'd probably have heard you—and so he ran for it."

"He didn't run for it," said Caroline slowly. Her mind was going back, back over the recent encounter in the darkness of the stable. "He didn't run for it." She spoke in a tone of complete conviction. "He didn't run for it, because . . . it wasn't a man. As I was falling, I put my hand out to clutch at something, anything, as one does. At the time, I was too terrified to realize what it was—but now I know. The thing I touched was a skirt."

The sergeant was the first to speak. "Could you swear to that, Miss Wyatt?"

"Yes, I could. I can. Whoever was in there was . . . a woman."

The inspector said nothing until they were almost at the door of Whitewings. Then he stopped, and she looked up at him in dismay.

"You're coming in, aren't you?" she said.

"Not now. I'm coming in after lunch. Will you do something for me?"

"Yes," she said unhesitatingly, and he smiled.

"Will you say nothing whatever—to anybody—about what happened over at Crossways just now?"

"I'll do my best." She looked up at him. "Perhaps I shouldn't say this, but I have to—it's something I just don't understand."

"Well, what is it?"

"I've never had anything to do with ——"

"Crime?"

"Yes. But all the same, it seems fantastic to think that your investigations should ——"

"—— should bring me into a house like Mrs. Heywood's in which everybody is of course above suspicion?"

"Yes," she said, with a touch of stubbornness. "I know that you're here to deal with facts, but doesn't local knowledge go for anything? If the people living here have a fairly intimate knowledge of one another, don't you take that knowledge into account?"

"How much did anybody here know of Mrs. Lauder—or her companion—or her maid? How much did your brother-in-law know about his own cook? What does your sister really know about the children's nanny?"

Sensible new approach to weight control

You eat the foods you like

Cut down instead of cutting out

Sugar is a basic element in this modern concept for these important reasons:

1. Sugar helps to keep your appetite satisfied on less food.
2. By making your diet interesting, sugar can help you to stay on it.
3. Ounce for ounce, no other food supplies energy so fast, with so few calories. So sugar helps overcome a lack of energy while you are dieting.

Recent findings about dieting are confirming what a lot of people, all the way along, have thought was just good common sense.

Don't turn your normal eating habits upside down, say these findings. Don't involve yourself in bizarre, "wonder" diets that are in conflict with sound nutritional principles.

Go ahead and eat the good things you have been accustomed to having on your table. Cut the portions down, but don't cut them out.

This is especially reassuring to those people who have been wanting to lose weight but who have been suspicious of the artificial "fads" which, these days, come at them from all directions.

For example, now it is known there isn't a basic dieting reason in the world why any normal, healthy person should have to use artificial, imitation sweeteners instead of the natural sweetener, sugar.

Sugar Now the Big News in Dieting

But far more important than that, scientists now recognize that sugar can be of positive help to you in actually taking off weight.

At first blush, this may strike you as incongruous, particularly if you have been exposed to many of the weird, "one-sided" diets that have been springing up lately.

However, the truth is that there are fundamental scientific reasons establishing not only the importance of sugar in the daily diet, but also the "how's" and "why's" of its effectiveness in controlling weight.

It's a scientific fact, for instance, that sugar satisfies the appetite faster than any other food. Your own experience will tell you that if you eat or drink something that contains sugar shortly before a meal, it is much easier to be satisfied with less food. Thus, sugar makes it possible for you to experience a fuller satisfaction from smaller portions than you might from a much larger meal which contained no sugar.

Sugar Helps Control Weight Naturally

Of course, no dieting program is any good unless you stay on it long enough for it to be effective. One of the big troubles is that people become bored with dieting and stop before they should.

So here is another area in which sugar has been demonstrated to be of real assistance . . . Sugar, and foods and beverages made with sugar, are generally "interesting" to the taste. They help you to stay interested in your weight-control program. And remember, if you use sugar in a balanced diet, you can keep right on eating the same foods that you like and have eaten all your life.

Another reason you often hear from people who haven't been able to make a diet "stick" is the fact that they get tired too easily—lack energy and the zest for living. This is where sugar really shines. It's the quickest source of food energy there is.

Out of the 1400 to 1800 calories a day your reducing diet will probably permit, a teaspoonful of sugar represents only 18. Even 10 teaspoonfuls will only be 180 calories. And yet, that sugar will be converted into energy by your body faster than any other food you eat.

Three-Year Test Confirms New Findings

Sugar can help you eat less, make it more pleasure for you to do it and give you energy while you need it. In a nutshell, this is why the modern trend in diet thinking by knowing people is toward a natural way to lose weight by using sugar to help cut down.

Proof of it all comes from a leading University in cooperation with the dietary department of one of America's foremost teaching hospitals. In a study of the dietary experiences of more than 300 overweight people, they found that people who gave up sugar entirely and used artificial sweeteners lost no more weight than those who used sugar regularly in their diets.

Which may seem like a stand-off except for one important thing—most of the people who tried the artificial sweeteners just couldn't learn to like them even after three years of use.

We really don't have to remind you . . . you like sugar. But isn't it nice to know, from the scientists, that you haven't been wrong about it!

"My stepmother may have owed Mrs. Lauder money, but you can't seriously believe that she could murder anybody."

"You've got an odd view of murder, you know. People don't always murder from motives of hatred, or revenge, or greed. They sometimes kill in fear. Your stepmother is a very frightened woman."

"But it's fantastic to ——"

"—— to suspect anybody connected with Whitewings?"

It was exactly what she felt, but his words left her wishing that she had left the subject alone. He had made her feel foolish; he was mocking her, but not in the way he had mocked her when they first met. This was something different—this was something colder and harsher. The knowledge brought with it a dejection that almost overwhelmed her. If he noticed it, he gave no sign.

"Do you feel all right now?"

"Yes, thank you."

He left her and she went into the house and up to her room.

Kathryn looked up at the inspector from behind the coffee tray.

"The coffee's still hot," she told him. "Would you like some?"

"No, thank you. I'm sorry to come so early, Mrs. Heywood."

The formality of his tone brought Guy's eyes to rest on him uneasily. "Has anything happened?" he asked.

Before replying, the inspector listened to the sound of a car's wheels crunching on the gravel outside. Guy glanced out the window.

"It's the sergeant—and another fellow. Shall I bring them in?"

"Not at the moment, please," said the inspector, and turned to Kathryn. "Your sister had an unpleasant experience a little while ago," he said quietly.

Kathryn swung round in surprise.

"Miss Wyatt followed me over to Crossways this morning—I had said something which worried her, and she wanted to see me and ask me to explain what I meant. On her way over—by the short cut—she heard a noise in the stables and with appalling foolhardiness went in to investigate. She was ——"

"It's all right, Katie," said Caroline, trying to speak lightly as she saw Kathryn's white face. "I had to go in and see. It was curiosity that killed the cat—but I got off lightly. Someone pushed me—that's all."

"Who was it?" asked Guy sharply.

"A criminal on the run," said the inspector. "There has been a second murder, Mrs. Heywood."

"I suppose you mean . . . Lauder?" said Guy in a stunned voice.

"You mean . . . the man we picked up this morning?" asked Kathryn.

"Yes. I asked your sister not to mention it because I wanted to see that the news doesn't spread; that it doesn't go beyond yourselves for the next few hours."

"You can depend on us," said Guy. "We're not likely to want to talk about it. I wish I'd taken the whole family away when this thing began."

"None of you will come to any harm unless—as Miss Wyatt did—you go out of your way to look for trouble. There's another matter that brought me here this afternoon. Mrs. Heywood, would you allow me to speak to your cook, please? I would very much like to see her alone."

Kathryn stared at him. Guy looked at his wife and spoke quietly.

"Take Carol into the drawing room, will you?" he said. "I'll join you there when I've sent Collier in to see the inspector."

Kathryn and Caroline stood, wordless, in the drawing room. Guy came in and, closing the door behind him, looked helplessly at his wife. She came over to him and his arms closed about her.

"I'm—I'm frightened, Guy," she confessed.

"There's nothing to worry about," he said gently, but his eyes, meeting Caroline's, were dark with apprehension.

They heard the inspector's voice in the hall. Kathryn moved to the door, but Guy put out a hand to stop her. There were footsteps and then the sound of a car driving away.

For a moment they thought that the inspector had left without coming in to see them—and then the door opened and they saw him standing on the threshold, grave and silent. "I'm sorry to have to tell you this," he said quietly, "but your cook, Collier, has gone into Downsbury with Sergeant Cobb."

"You mean," said Guy, "that you've put her under arrest."

"I mean that she is being . . . detained," said the inspector levelly. "Shall we leave it at that for the moment?"

The next day—Good Friday—was one of almost unprecedented gloom. The morning began with light rain that turned to a heavy downpour; soon, torrents were beating furiously against the windows. As the morning wore on, Nanny put her two charges in the care of Caroline and went to relieve Kathryn in the kitchen.

"I will cook; you go," she told her firmly. "I can do it myself." She paused to wipe away tears. "Oh my, how silly I am," she sighed. "But with the children, I can't cry, isn't it? With them I have to be cheerful, the poor little mites—but here with you it is different. All the time I'm thinking of poor Mrs. Collier and you know, Mrs. Heywood, madam"—she raised a tearstained face—"all the time I'm saying no, there's something wrong; she didn't do anything. So why ——"

"We don't know anything about it, Nanny," said Kathryn slowly. "Mr. Heywood and I feel just as you do, but we can't do anything." She did not want to think about it any more; her head ached with thinking.

Nanny, looking at her white, tired face, spoke again in a new and vigorous tone. "Now you go away and leave me here," she said. "I've got all settled what I'm going to do."

Kathryn left her, glad to be able to be near Caroline and the children. Guy would not be back for lunch; Estelle was in her room, sitting near the fire, wrapped in the frozen silence with which she had received the news of Collier's departure. Of the death of Lauder she was still in ignorance; the inspector had said that they were to tell nobody—and he had not made an exception of Estelle.

A figure, bent almost double against the driving rain, came to the front door during the morning and was admitted by Caroline. Miss Parry, dripping wet, spoke in a hurried voice. "Miss Wyatt, I—I would so like to help in some way. With Collier gone, there must be work for me. I can ——"

"How did you know about Collier?" asked Caroline.

"The car came to Crossways and they took Collier into the garden and to the spot where —— We couldn't help seeing—and then we were questioned again, Braddock and I, and they took Collier away and I've been thinking about you all ever since and wondering what I could do to help. I'd do anything to get away from that house for a little while! I beg you—do try to persuade your sister to let me stay and make myself useful. Please."

Kathryn was already in the hall, looking with dismay at the visitor. She remembered, with a sinking of the heart, the account that Nanny had given of the incident which had almost occurred between Miss Parry and Delfine. It would not be possible that this wan, unhappy-looking woman could intend any harm to the children, but she neither needed her services nor desired her company. But it seemed impossible to put her outside again in the wild weather.

Caroline came to the rescue. "I can use Miss Parry, Kathryn," she said. "I'm in charge of the children, but there's a lot of washing and ironing of theirs that needs ——"

"Please let me do it." Miss Parry produced a rolled-up apron. Tying it on, she seemed to become less a stranger. She looked at Caroline expectantly, and Caroline led her upstairs; in a few minutes Miss Parry had set to work.

For the rest of the day, she worked ceaselessly and systematically. She had to go into and out of the kitchen, but there was no exchange between her and Nanny, for the latter was making no secret of her dislike and distrust of the unasked-for helper.

Caroline took in Estelle's lunch and found her pacing restlessly about the room, still in her housecoat.

Estelle sat down and looked listlessly at the tray. "Give me a cigarette, will you? Thanks. There's a lighter in my bag."

Marie Gifford's secret—perfect pie crust in 5 minutes

The final test of a pie is the crust. To turn out melt-in-your-mouth crust start with the right shortening. The right shortening is lard and the finest lard is Armour Star!*

Marie Gifford, Armour's Home Economist and pastry authority, makes this wonderful crust in just five minutes: Measure 2 cups all-purpose flour, then sift with 1 teaspoon salt. Blend in ⅔ cup Armour Star Lard until mixture resembles coarse meal. Add 4 tablespoons tap water. Mix lightly, press into ball. Roll out to ⅛" thickness.

WOODBURY LANOLIN-RICH DRY SKIN CREAM

Caroline opened her bag to find the lighter and, pausing a moment to steady herself, flicked it open. She noticed, almost with detachment, that her hand was perfectly still, and she steeled herself to casualness as she closed the lighter again and turned to slip it into the handbag. But this time she made sure that she had really seen the paper that lay in her stepmother's bag; this time, she saw the words written on it. There was no doubt.

Caroline went quietly to her bedroom and, closing the door behind her, sat on the bed and stared in front of her. What she had seen in Estelle's bag was the anonymous letter which had been stolen from Miss Parry.

She sat still, unable to feel shocked or even surprised. She was without the slightest idea of what she should do with the knowledge. To tell Kathryn would only add to her worries. Telling the inspector would be a betrayal of her stepmother. She could tell Guy; the idea of sharing the responsibility was comforting, irresistible. But Guy would not be home until evening; in the meantime, she must put the matter out of her mind.

She went downstairs to find Kathryn waiting for her in the dining room.

"Sorry I'm late. Where's Miss Parry?" she asked, as they sat down to lunch.

"Nanny said she'd asked to have lunch with them in the nursery. I think she'd have liked to refuse—she's behaving very oddly."

"Nanny?"

"Yes."

"It's partly because of Collier, but there's something else too," Caroline said. "Jealousy."

"Jealousy?"

"Yes. It's a funny thing: Miss Parry didn't make the slightest move to get friendly with Dandy and Delfine, but they've both been following her round devotedly. She's made a hit—so I can understand Nanny's feelings. Pity children haven't got more tact."

"I asked Nanny—perhaps I was silly—not to leave the children alone with Miss Parry. You remember that incident ——"

"Yes. I don't understand it—but quite honestly, Katie, I've giving up trying to understand anything."

They went upstairs after lunch; as they reached the landing, they saw Nanny coming out of Estelle's room. She explained breathlessly on her way to the nursery, "Mrs. Wyatt called me. She wanted me to take away her tray—but I didn't bring it. I said, 'Eat just a little bit, madam.' She looks ill, but!"

They reached the nursery, their feet making no sound on the carpeted floor. At the end of the long room, Miss Parry knelt on the floor, her back toward them. Dandy, with intense concentration, was retying her apron strings. Standing before her was Delfine, one hand on Miss Parry's shoulder, the other holding a half-eaten biscuit. Her gaze, intent, absorbed, never left the face of the woman.

"Then," Miss Parry continued, "then the little boy said, 'Oh, but Mr. Giant, you're simply being silly, because giants don't frighten me at all.' So the giant got awfully cross—because he'd tried very hard to make the little boy think that he was a great, big horrid fellow, and so ——"

Kathryn tugged gently at Nanny's arm; together, the three turned and walked downstairs. Nanny struggled briefly with her sense of justice and then spoke unwillingly.

"Then that time I told you about, when she was going up to Delfine—she was going just to talk to her, isn't it?"

"Yes; I think so, Nanny," said Kathryn.

"I'm sorry I said she was bad."

Kathryn and Caroline began to clear the dining table. Both were remembering, with some discomfort, the undertones in Miss Parry's voice. Quietly though she had spoken, there could be heard below the words of the fairy-story emotions with which they had not credited the speaker: tenderness, love and a deep, heartbreaking longing.

When nothing else seems to help, I go and look at a stonecutter hammering away at his rock, perhaps a hundred times without a crack showing in it. Yet at the hundred-and-first blow the rock will split in two, and I know that it was not only that blow which split it, but all that had gone before.
JACOB A. RIIS

It was late before Guy returned. Miss Parry had gone, first getting from Kathryn permission to return on the morrow. Nanny and the children were in bed; Estelle had had a light dinner and had asked to be left undisturbed until morning. Guy ate the dinner which had been kept warm for him, and then looked critically at his wife and sister-in-law.

"Bed," he said. "You both looked washed out."

"Tomorrow'll be a bad day," said Kathryn.

"Nothing will be as bad as yesterday," said Guy. "I'm certain."

He was less certain in the morning. Estelle's bed had not been slept in, and she was nowhere to be found.

During the morning Avery Freeland did not appear.

"We'll have to get in touch with him as soon as possible about Estelle, won't we?" Kathryn, pale with worry, questioned Guy.

He frowned in exasperation. The storm had damaged the telephone wires; he would have to go out and look for Freeland, he thought, and then spoke angrily.

"Leave it for a while. First, I'm going to try 'n' find out where she's gone. I always knew she was a fool, but I didn't think that even Estelle could lose her head to this extent."

"Something might have happened to her. She might have ——"

"Not a chance," said Guy. "You wouldn't find Estelle doing herself any injury. No; she's bolted, that's all. She knew something, and she knew the inspector would get it out of her. I'll go into Downsbury and telephone every place or person she's ever mentioned and see what that produces."

Guy came back just before lunch, but his face told them that he had no news.

"Not a sign," he said bitterly. "I'll walk over after lunch and hand over to the inspector."

Lunch was a quiet meal. Kathryn was looking anxiously at her husband's tired face and Caroline was wondering why the inspector had not come in to see them and why she had spent the morning hoping that he would.

Guy scarcely spoke; he was occupied by recent events: two people had been murdered, his wife's stepmother had disappeared, the police had taken away a member of his household—it was on this last event that he found his mind dwelling. Gone were Collier's simple, well-served dishes; the meals cooked by Nanny were a series of fiery curries and pilaus and who knew what other devil's concoctions.

He took a mouthful, swallowed it hastily and reached for the water jug.

"Did the children eat this too?" he asked Kathryn.

She looked at him and he saw that she was near to tears; whether of curry or emotion, he could not tell, but her look went to his heart and he resolved that he would eat every bit of his lunch, plate and all, if it would make her happy.

"Isn't there a party of sorts today?" he inquired presently.

"Only for Dandy. It's Basil Wilkinson's birthday, but no girls have been invited," said Kathryn. "It's an afternoon party, not one that'll go on after tea. Mrs. Wilkinson ——"

She did not finish, but they all knew that nobody felt easy about children being away from their own homes at the present time; the party had not been put off, but the visitors would be sent home immediately after tea.

"If I could have the car," said Caroline, "I could drop Dandy at the Wilkinsons' and then go on with Miss Burnley to the church to do the flowers."

She went upstairs and passed Nanny and Delfine on their way out for a walk. Dandy was in his room and Miss Parry was putting the finishing touches to his unfamiliar appearance—second-best flannel suit, hair brushed, hands clean and Basil's birthday present neatly packed.

"We're driving to the village, Miss Parry," aroline told her. "Would you like to come? liss Burnley and I are going to the church to o the flowers."

Miss Parry colored. "Do you think she ould allow me to come and help?"

"I don't see why you shouldn't. I imagine ey'll be only too glad to have you."

"Can I have two pieces of cake if they ask e?" Dandy inquired anxiously of Caroline.

"If they ask you," she said, and drew up at e Wilkinson front door. Through it they eard the yelling of strong young voices.

"Gosh, they're all there! I'm late!" said andy, struggling with the door and all but illing out in his haste. "'By, Aunt Caroline!"

"You'll go straight home, Dandy, won't ou?" she called after him.

"Yes."

Caroline waited until the door opened to dmit him; then she drove away.

"Would you be very kind?" Miss Burnley sked. "I've been keeping a rather heavy irror that somebody sent to the last jumble le; it struck me that I might buy it—it was nly a few shillings—and put it up in Mrs. urk's bedroom as a little Easter gift. Now at we have the car, it would save my having carry it."

"Did you think of going to do it now?" sked Miss Parry. "I'll come to Mrs. Turk's d help you with it."

Miss Burnley thanked her, but first, she id, they would go to the church. The vicar as there, going from one to another, saying othing, smiling his gentle, absent smile. Miss urnley and Miss Parry slipped out after a hile and Miss Burnley returned alone; Miss arry, she told Caroline, had stayed behind to dy up the room for Mrs. Turk.

Caroline stood aside as the vicar and tokes went out through the narrow vestry oorway; then she stood quite still to examine disturbing realization that had come to her. faint feeling of coldness touched her. She ft Miss Burnley in the vestry; walking into e empty church, she stood looking round at e massed flowers, and her eyes rested at last n Mrs. Lauder's lilies.

Lilies. . . . Lilies on the terrace; lilies on the tar; lilies on the coffin. Lilies ——

There was something else—something that as important, Caroline realized suddenly. here was a message in those waxen blooms—ere was a message and a danger signal. She ooked toward the altar and once more her es rested on the lilies. They seemed to her be no longer standing tall and graceful in eir vases; they were swaying before her eyes, ending, beckoning ——

She strove desperately to clear the mists om her brain. The answer, she knew, was up ere with the lilies. Something had hap-ened—she had touched a spring, a secret ring. It was not the scent of flowers that she uld smell now; it was danger. It was ——

Then, with a suddenness that brought ter-r so great that it drowned all lesser fear, she new. The lilies had sent their message—and last she understood it. And then she was on er feet, stumbling. She was outside the urch, running—running to find Avery Free-nd and to tell him what she knew. She must nd him. He would be near—he or his man.

She reached the gate of Mrs. Turk's cot-ge, and stopped. A crowd stood there, star-g at the door of the cottage, but the door was ut and before it stood the burly form of Ser-eant Cobb. Near him stood the figure Caro-ne was seeking.

She did not know whether she called out or ot, but he turned and saw her, and after one ance made his way through the crowd and ame up to her and, without a thought for the nlookers, took her in his arms and held her rmly. She fought for breath and for words, ut she could only look up at him tremblingly.

"I want ——" she managed at last. "I came ——"

"Don't try to talk." His voice was quiet, but mething in it—some deep quality of anger—ierced through her horror and sent her glance the crowd standing at the gate. "It's all ght," he said steadily.

"What is it?" whispered Caroline.

"Mrs. Turk was . . . attacked. She's safe; we got here in time."

The last vestige of control left Caroline. "I came as soon as I knew, as soon as I was sure!"

"Quiet," he said gently. "Everything's all right now."

"But I've got to tell you. I ——"

"You can tell me nothing that I don't know already. It'll be all over in a few minutes," he told her. "But you can't go back to Whitewings yet."

"Why not?" She stared at him.

"Because nobody is to enter the grounds of Crossways at any point for the next ——"

"Dandy!" gasped Caroline.

"Where's Dandy?" the inspector asked. "He was to go home by himself."

He had turned away; he shouted a command to the men round the door and the sergeant, putting a whistle to his lips, blew a shrill, urgent summons. Then they were following the inspector—running to the two police cars that stood near. They were gone, into the lane that led past the church, past the stables—and Caroline, staring after them, realized that Mrs. Lauder's forecast had been correct: there were cars, there was wheeled traffic speeding through the right of way.

Kathryn had been getting ready for the return of the family; the children's supper table was laid, the room was tidy, the bathroom in order. Soon Nanny would return with Delfine; Guy would be home, and Caroline and Dandy.

She glanced from the order within the house to the pleasant green of her garden; from it her eyes went to the lane with its gloomy shadows, its uninviting look. And then she saw Dandy: Dandy, walking carelessly homeward; Dandy coming unconcernedly along the lane.

Before she was aware of having moved from the window, she found herself running swiftly along the lane, forgetful of her old, vague fears, remembering only that Dandy was there, alone—and she wanted to be with him. She wanted to feel his hand in hers; the two of them, coming home together.

He saw her approaching, and his walk changed to a series of careless, awkward skips; they came toward each other—and then Kathryn halted. Over Dandy's head she saw another figure coming swiftly. It was Miss Parry, and as she saw Kathryn she gave a desperate lunge in an effort to increase her speed. Her eyes, wide open and staring, were on Kathryn's; her lips were moving, but it was impossible to hear what she said.

Kathryn put out a hand, grasped Dandy's and then released it. Her body felt leaden, but her mind was calm and clear. Something was going to happen; it must not happen to Dandy.

"Go on home, darling," she said gently. "I'll follow you in a minute. Go on," she urged as he hesitated. "Supper's ready."

He needed no more; he broke into a run and Kathryn, without turning, knew that he had neared the house, entered the house, gone in to safety, to security.

Then she tried to turn and follow him, but it was too late. A hand had seized her—she tried to wrench herself free, but the terrible grip moved to her shoulder, to her throat. She fought wordlessly as the hands tightened. She heard, in the infinite distance, the sound of a voice, and a rush of movement; then she felt herself sinking into a pit of darkness.

Kathryn lay that evening on a sofa in her drawing room. Beside her sat Guy; her hand was in his. On a big chair opposite was curled Caroline; near her sat the inspector. All was peace and comfort and quiet; fears were over. Danger had touched them, brushed them and left them at last unharmed.

The inspector began to fill in the details of the story of which they knew, as yet, only the bare outline. His voice, calm and slow, answered Guy's last question.

"I'd better begin at the beginning," he said, "and to do that, we have to go a long time back to a place called Carrabin—in Queensland. Mrs. Lauder married there and was widowed in middle age. Her husband left her a large fortune; it was left to her for her lifetime, and after her death it was to go to two nephews of her husband—they were then children of ten and twelve.

"Unfortunately, it was stipulated that the money was to be divided equally between the two brothers—and it was this clause, more than forty years ago, that was responsible for what has taken place here in Downsview during the past few days.

"The trouble began," said the inspector, "when the boys grew up. Mrs. Lauder had become very fond of James, the younger nephew—and she detested Kenneth, the elder. Kenneth Lauder was accused of having embezzled some of his aunt's funds. He was tried, convicted—and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment."

"The letter!" said Kathryn. "Then it was he who wrote it."

"Yes; he wrote it," said the inspector. "He knew that Mrs. Lauder and his brother, James, had between them arranged the conviction to get him out of the way—not merely for ten years, but for good. His health had always been precarious, and it was extremely unlikely that he would live to finish his sentence.

"But he did live. The thought of revenge gave him strength to keep going until he got out of prison and collected his proofs. He had a choice: he could put them in the hands of the police—or he could find his aunt and his brother and come to terms with them."

"Blackmail?" said Guy.

"Yes. He had some difficulty in tracing his relations; thieves fall out, and Mrs. Lauder and James were no longer on good terms. They had both left Carrabin, and James had later married without consulting her—that may have started the trouble between them. Mrs. Lauder moved about for a time; then she met your stepmother in Switzerland, and through her came to Crossways.

"Once established here in Downsview, she must have felt pretty safe from the past. She was in a small, remote village; she never went out and she was not well known. She engaged two servants and paid them high wages to ensure their staying with her for her lifetime: she made it clear that she would leave them nothing, and so protected herself from any danger of neglect—or worse.

"After her murder," went on the inspector, "both these servants made statements. Checking up, we found Miss Parry's to be in order, but when we came to the maid's—Braddock's—we began to find several discrepancies—and so we came to find our first links."

"Did you know right from the beginning that Braddock had murdered Mrs. Lauder?" asked Kathryn.

"Almost from the beginning. She killed her in panic. She stole the letter to find out what was in it. What was a mystery to you and to Miss Parry was clear enough to her: Kenneth Lauder was free, and was on his way to Downsview. He was coming with proofs, and he was coming to blackmail. If he met Mrs. Lauder, his first care would be, of course, to make her give him his share of the money—and so it became imperative to prevent him from reaching her.

"If she could have got a message through to her accomplice that evening Mrs. Lauder would have been in no danger. Kenneth Lauder would have been put out of the way, his papers destroyed, his very identity difficult to establish. But the message couldn't reach the proper quarter—and so Braddock had to deal with the matter in her own way. She killed Mrs. Lauder. It was a crude crime; stupid, ill conceived and terribly bungled.

"If we had arrested her, we would never have been able to lay hands on her accomplice. Our plan was to wait—and watch. We wanted to give both criminals a feeling of confidence. We had proof enough to arrest one—but only one. If we had arrested Braddock, our other bird would have flown.

"And then," went on the inspector, "something happened that wasn't on our schedule.

es." The inspector's face hardened. "I : that your stepmother will be wiser all ife for this experience."

Guy looked at him. "Exactly how far was she . . . involved?" he asked.

"She wouldn't have been involved at all if she hadn't been living in Mrs. Lauder's house in Switzerland. Kenneth Lauder showed up there merely wanting to be redirected. Mrs. Wyatt was in a tight spot; she owed Mrs. Lauder money and Mrs. Lauder, after a series of warnings, had at last instructed her solicitors to act in the matter. Mrs. Wyatt had no hope of finding the money, but when Kenneth Lauder put in an appearance, she didn't—as she stated—stop at a brief interview; she found out what he was after, and she thought she saw a chance of turning the incident to her own advantage. She telegraphed to Mrs. Lauder and left at once for England; she hoped she could do a bit of bargaining—she would exchange her knowledge of Lauder's intentions for a clearance of her own debt. But her plane was delayed; she got here very little before Kenneth Lauder—and in any case, too late to talk to his aunt."

"You mean"—Kathryn's tone was incredulous—"she would have gone as far as that to ——"

"She owed Mrs. Lauder four thousand pounds," the inspector told her quietly. "It was a long-standing debt and when she saw a chance of clearing it, she . . . took it. She won't, I think, risk getting herself on the wrong side of the law in the future. She's had a pretty grim lesson—and she hasn't, in any case, the kind of nerve that ill-doers need. Mrs. Wyatt kept her head long enough to go up to the body and take something from the dead woman's hand—but it wasn't, as she had thought, the telegram she had sent her from Switzerland. It was the anonymous letter that Braddock had stolen from Miss Parry; the letter that Braddock had put into her hand hoping that—if things turned out badly—the police would be led on a false trail after the writer of the letter. When Mrs. Wyatt was questioned, and when she found out that the police knew more than she'd given them credit for, she ——"

"—— bolted," said Guy.

"She came to me—the first sensible thing she had done since coming here."

"My wife thought she'd betaken herself to a watery grave," Guy said, "but I wasn't alarmed—much."

"She went to my uncle's house and they sent for me—but by that time, of course, matters were moving too fast for me to go over and talk to her. We had our proofs."

"But you let Collier go before you got your proofs," said Guy, frowning.

"No." The inspector smiled. "Collier was having a rather dull time up in Mrs. Cobb's spare room. She stuck it very well; she would have rather enjoyed it if it hadn't been that she knew what you were all going through—thinking she was disloyal, and a criminal."

"I never for a moment believed she could murder anybody," said Kathryn firmly. "We all thought you'd made a mistake."

"It was the mirror—Miss Burnley's Easter gift to old Mrs. Turk—that brought us to the end of the Lauder case."

"What exactly was the sequence of events at the cottage?" asked Guy.

"It was all very quick," said the inspector. "Miss Burnley and Miss Parry carried the mirror into old Mrs. Turk's bedroom and presented it to her—and then hung it on the wall; it looked very nice and the old lady was pleased with it. Miss Parry sat down for a few minutes with the old lady—and then they both chanced to look up into the mirror.

"Mrs. Turk had never been able to look through the window at the head of the bed—a window that overlooked a well-screened little plot at the side of the cottage. The mirror gave a clear view of everything taking place outside that window—and Miss Parry and old Mrs. Turk saw quite clearly the meeting that was taking place outside. Two people met—and talked: two people who were thought to be strangers, who had never, in the knowledge of anybody at Downsview, been connected in any way. They met as intimates, as accomplices. Braddock was one of them."

The inspector was staring into the fire, and his next words came slowly.

"Mrs. Turk was deaf and dumb," he said, "and bedridden—but she had all her wits about her. She knew, when she looked into the mirror, why Braddock had paid her so many visits with flowers and fruit. She had used the cottage as a screen for meetings. Mrs. Turk managed to make Miss Parry see what she must do: go to the police.

"Miss Parry, by God's grace, found me almost at once. But she hadn't realized that Braddock would go inside the cottage—and that once inside, she would see the mirror and realize how much Mrs. Turk had seen. We got there just in time to save Mrs. Turk's life. And then"—the inspector looked at Caroline—"you told me that Dandy had gone home by the stables, and ——"

Guy lifted Kathryn's hand he was holding and dropped a light kiss on it.

"These two women," said Guy, in a tone which he endeavored to keep light, "seem to like running into trouble."

The inspector looked at Kathryn. "When your sister got into the way of a criminal on the run," he said soberly, "she was walking toward danger. She couldn't be attacked from behind, and that fact saved her life. She had time to scream—but you didn't. We were on our way to you—but I don't think we would have been in time if Miss Parry hadn't followed Dandy and held off the attacker."

Kathryn spoke steadily. "Miss Parry saved my life, didn't she?"

"I think we may say that she did," said the inspector.

"When I told you the other day," Caroline said, "that it was a woman, you—you knew it wasn't."

"Yes, I knew," said the inspector. "But it was too early, just then, to tell you the truth. Braddock and her husband, James Lauder, were to inherit, provided Kenneth didn't turn up to claim his share, something like thirty thousand pounds under Mrs. Lauder's husband's will. All they had to do was wait for it. But they had to make certain that if Kenneth lived and came out of prison, he could not get to his aunt. Braddock was safe enough from discovery by Mrs. Lauder; they had never met and so she could, without risk, take a situation in which she could watch Mrs. Lauder constantly. With James it was different; he had to be certain that his aunt would never see him; and so he placed himself in a job from which he could, without arousing suspicion, be seen near the grounds of Crossways and meet his wife and keep in touch. And that is why when Miss Wyatt was attacked, she thought she had touched a woman's skirt. That was why, when she brushed by it again, she realized that it had not, after all, been a skirt but a robe. A verger's robe. A robe worn by Stokes, who was ill on the day the anonymous letter arrived, who was in bed at the vicarage, where his wife couldn't reach him; Stokes, who had hidden safely in the shadow of the church, to which Mrs. Lauder never went and against which she had the bitterest prejudice. Stokes—who was James Lauder, murderer of his brother, Kenneth."

The church at Downsview, on that Easter morning, was packed. The inspector sat with the Heywoods in their pew, and Guy was giving the fact some troubled thought. A word in the inspector's ear—a little hint, as from man to man, to put him on his guard —— A man was a man and not a fish; if one wanted to catch him, one didn't use a net.

But there he was now, sitting between Dandy and Delfine and looking already like one of the family. He was coming to lunch and also—with his uncle—to dinner; Kathryn had issued the invitations, and Guy's rider to the effect that if the inspector didn't feel like turning up, they would understand, had earned him a vicious pinch on the arm and a painful hack on the ankle from a hitherto gentle wife.

He sighed, and left the problem. The inspector looked like a fellow who could look out for himself, and Caroline, at all events, was showing no signs of joining in the chase. Far from it; she had announced her decision to return to London on the next day.

His thoughts went to the incidents that had followed upon the death of Mrs. Lauder. Miss Parry was cooking and working for the vicar, side by side with Miss Burnley. Pink-cheeked and almost bustling, she sat in the vicarage pew looking very nearly as exalted as the vicar.

The congregation rose to sing the hymn, and the sound shook the little church. Miss Burnley—in a hat which had started out that morning as a turban and which had unwound itself and was now on the point of becoming a scarf—oblivious, sang what she imagined to be an alto part; during the next prayer, Miss Parry was seen to lean forward, and when the congregation rose again the turban was fastened with a pretty little gold pin.

The service over, Guy and Kathryn had some difficulty in extricating the inspector from those who wanted to shake him by the hand. They got him free at last and the family went toward the two parked cars.

"Tell you what," suggested Guy, avoiding his wife's eyes, "I'll take Carol and Dandy—and you, inspector, can take my wife back with you." There was a helping hand.

But, "Not a bit of it," said the inspector instantly. "I wouldn't dream of splitting up your little family party. I'll bring Miss Wyatt."

Well, if the fellow wanted to go into it with his eyes open ——

The inspector turned to Caroline. He put her into her seat with an air, she thought, of one tucking something in tenderly. She glanced at him and found his eyes on her, as they had been on the first day they met—amused and gently mocking . . . and something else which she did not care to define.

He swung the car in a wide circle and drove in the opposite direction to that in which Guy had gone.

"We'll be late for lunch," commented Caroline.

"No, we won't. This car can move whenever you feel you're in a hurry. I thought we both needed a breath of nice, open air."

"Don't you find Downsview open enough?" she asked.

"At times, no." He looked at her—a brief, sideways glance. "Have you put all the trouble behind you?"

"Yes—in a way. When you finish a case," she asked, "do you forget all about it?"

"I forget the grim parts; and I take the beautiful widow for a drive into the country."

"Does she enjoy it?"

"Very much indeed—but of course I don't do it unless I've had some definite encouragement in the course of my investigations. If, for instance, she throws herself into my arms twice in two days, I allow myself to—well, to hope a little."

Caroline gave a shudder of remembra and he drew the car to the side of the road switched off the engine.

"I thought you said you'd forgotten it a" he said. "You've got to put it all away, y know."

"Yes . . . but I still wonder a little ab things. I ——"

"What things?"

"Well—for example—I can't understa why it took me so long, in the church yes day afternoon, to—to understand what it that had happened. How was it that I co feel terrified—feel ill with terror—and still know why?"

"Some people," he informed her smooth "have a very bad system of communicat inside their brain. Their ideas are wid spaced, as it were, and travel from one i to the other is difficult—ill organized."

"Don't joke. Tell me."

"All right," he agreed. "But the case is o and I'm off duty and I won't tell you as a pol inspector. If you were to say, 'Look, Ave do explain ——'"

"Look, Avery, do explain."

"'Please.'"

"Please."

"That's better. Well, take your sister: s got herself into a state of fear about passi through the stables. There was a very sim explanation for that: she had heard mo ments there, just as you heard them when y passed that day. But you were in a recepti state of mind; there had been trouble and y were on the alert for more—and so y associated the sound with danger. Your sis didn't associate it with anything—c sciously—but she registered it, all the sa somewhere deep down, and she registe it with a red tab for danger against So she shied every time she went past spot."

"But ——"

"Hold it. Now we come to you. When y were in the church yesterday, you were in receptive state again—but your lines we crossed. When you stood in the doorway a brushed against the verger's robe—for t second time—you sensed danger, but y made the mistake of trying to reason t thing out. It wasn't your reason that sent o the danger signal when James Lauder brush past you—and so it wasn't your reason th could give you the answer. If you'd been a animal, you'd have leaped aside the mome the robe touched you—but being an intel gent young woman, you sat down to reas it out. It's that kind of thing that decides pe ple's fate; if Lauder had had any idea of wh

IT'S FUNNY ABOUT MONEY

By PETER BRIGGS

I just don't know where it goes. A couple of days ago I had all that lovely, shiny, fat, crisp, negotiable bunch of bills. Today I'm not looking at the new ties in the shopwindow. Between now and payday it's hamburgers.

They say we're all making more money, and I guess it's true. We've got more "real wealth," too, so why should I ever be broke?

Everything can be blamed on childhood, of course, and mine was a very spendthrift one. When I was five an actress friend of my mother's gave me a purse with fifty pennies in it. (Some months later the actress charged a coat on my mother's account and immediately skipped town.) My pennies didn't last me at all. You've never seen a supply of jujubes like mine.

In school I used to be able to take my girl out for two dollars. What a spendthrift! I always went home broke.

I know other people who manage to save, save and save. Am I lacking some vertebra that I can't imitate them? What pill can I take that would automatically deduct 10 per cent for savings? I'm sure I wouldn't miss it if I never saw it. Except for my crafty streak that would slip into that savings bank and withdraw in a minute.

Do I have more fun because I can't hang on to money? Someday I'm going to conduct a survey among the open-purse people (and there are millions of us) to find out if improvidence is pleasurable.

It will depend on what day of the month it is, of course. Right after payday they'll all be floating high, gay as grasshoppers. "People who save are clods!" Try them later, when they're down to nickels, they'll fall all over themselves, full of guilt and remorse. Emotionally unstable, that's all. I wish someone would invent a pill.

had happened, you would have been dead before you'd had time to get your ideas sorted out." He turned and looked at her. "And I wouldn't have liked that at all," he ended.

"Why?" asked Caroline. "I should have thought it would have given that dossier a nice, final touch."

"It would," he told her; "but who wants to close it?"

"You said the case was over. In any case, I'm going back to London tomorrow."

"Ah," said the inspector. "Now what for?"

"To work."

"It's nice, isn't it, to feel that we both have our headquarters in London? When I get back to town, can I look you up?"

"Yes," said Caroline. "If you've time between cases. And now hadn't we better get back?"

Somewhat to her surprise, he drove her back to Whitewings in silence. She did nothing to break it; his voice had an effect on her that threatened to break down her resolution of going away from him, of getting away to free herself from the emotions he had roused in her. His eyes missed nothing; since she had been fool enough to fall in love with a man before he had so much as lifted a finger, she told herself fiercely and with burning self-contempt, her only course lay in flight. He could go on and make mocking speeches to the next woman in the next case—to the beautiful widows. If she stayed, every moment would make it more difficult to hide her feelings from those cool, gray, impersonal eyes.

The day was more or less a children's day. In the afternoon, Kathryn assembled some of Delfine's and Dandy's friends, and Guy and the inspector played hosts to visitors ranging in age from three to eight. Then the children went home and the inspector went away, to return in time for dinner. Kathryn and Caroline helped Nanny to put two tired but happy young people to bed.

Guy came up in time to kiss his daughter a fond good night. When her eyes were closing in sleep, Kathryn spoke to him softly.

"Go in and hear Dandy's prayers, will you, Guy? Carol and I have to go down and see to the dinner table."

He went in and sat on Dandy's bed, and Dandy knelt on the rug and mumbled sleepily.

"—— and keep us safe in our Father's bosom," he ended, and opened his eyes to fix them inquiringly on Guy. "Daddy."

"Well, son?"

"Basil Wilkinson says ——"

Oh my, oh my, intoned Guy to himself. Here it comes.

"Basil Wilkinson says that fathers don't have bosoms. Do they, daddy?"

"They —— Look now," said Guy, playing for time. "Hadn't you better pop into bed?"

"Basil Wilkinson says ——"

"Well now," said Guy, opening his recently started file on the subject, "take Abraham. He was a father, and he jolly well had a bosom; the Bible says so quite distinctly, and you can tell your friend Basil Wilkinson. And then there was that other chap"—he tucked the covers in neatly—"that chap who got himself mixed up with Shylock. I can't remember his name at the moment, but I'll take you to see the play one day; I'll take Basil Wilkinson, too, and he can prove the thing for himself. It's a very exciting play. Shylock is just going to carve this other chap up, and he's got the knife all ready, and the judge—who's not really a judge at all, but a girl dressed up—she says —— Gosh, I acted this once, you know—but don't tell your mother. I spouted it in a way that would have won me a prize at any drama school. 'Lay bare thy bosom,' I said—or was it 'Lay bare thy bosom for the knife'? I can't remember, but the chap's just going to slice off a nice piece of this other chap's heart, when ——"

"Is this a bedtime story?" inquired Kathryn's cold voice from the doorway.

"A —— Well, not exactly," said Guy. "I was just ——"

"You can go, thank you," said his wife, coming in and bending protectively over the bed. "I'll stay with Dandy."

"Oh, all right." Guy made a sheepish exit and went to dress for dinner.

The dinner went off, Kathryn thought, extremely well. Sir Hugh Freeland was tall, square-shouldered, gray-haired and inclined to heartiness; he enjoyed Collier's cooking almost as much as Guy did; later, when they were settled in the drawing room, he gave them all an account of some of his nephew's more spectacular exploits.

"Interestin' job," he ended. "But I shouldn't have talked so much." He glanced at the clock and started. "By Jove," he said, "I didn't dream ——" He looked at his nephew. "We've got to get off," he said. "This young feller's got to make an early start."

Kathryn looked at the inspector in open dismay.

"Oh—you're not going away!" she exclaimed. "We were so hoping that you'd stay and be friendly instead of being official."

"No; he's got to get back, he says," Hugh told them. "Won't hear of putting off. Says it's urgent, but"—he poked Guy playfully in the ribs—"you and I, Heywood, could make a bet about what's taking him back to town in the middle of his leave, eh?"

"Well," began Guy, "I ——"

"It's a woman," said Sir Hugh triumphantly. "He as good as admitted it to me on the way here. Now come on, Avery, m'boy," he urged. "Speak up, speak up; it's a woman, isn't it?"

Within us we have a hope that always walks in front of our present narrow experience; it is the undying faith of the infinite in us; it will never accept any of our disabilities as a permanent fact; it sets no limit to its own scope; it dares to assert that man has oneness with God, and its wild dream comes true every day.

RABINDRANATH TAGORE

The inspector gave a gentle smile; his eyes went round the company and came to rest thoughtfully on Caroline.

"Well, if you must know . . . yes," he said slowly. "It's—shall we say it's a girl?"

"I knew it," chuckled Sir Hugh. "Well now, out with it; when's it coming off?"

"Not for some time," said the inspector, his eyes still fixed absently on Caroline. "Not for a couple of months at least."

"And what's she like, eh?"

"She's lovely. Quite, quite lovely."

"Good; I like a pretty gal. But if I'm going to be her uncle, I ought to know who she is—eh, Heywood? Come on; out with it, Avery."

"Different people call her different things," said the inspector.

"And what do you call her?"

The inspector walked slowly across the room and took Caroline's chin in his hand. Tilting her head, he looked into her stormy angry eyes and she saw, suddenly, what lay behind the gentle mockery.

"I call her Carrie," he said. EN

Of course he is. But, does he look the same?

right through my doorway. And Mrs. McGuirk and Mrs. Esposito were pulling each other's hair! What can their families be thinking of to keep them here?"

What are you thinking of, sons and daughters?

You tell me you haven't money for a better place. And money does make a difference. Mrs. Culbertson lives in a residential hotel, and though she may be lonely for the family she never visits (money won't solve that problem), she's lonesome in comfort. But folks living on old-age assistance can't be choosy about their dwelling places.

All right, you ask, why don't I do something about it? I would, but a visiting nurse can only nag and persuade—she can't enforce. And few municipalities have boarding-home laws or inspectors. In most cases, the only things checked are fire hazards, kitchen sanitation, the number of toilets and the heat. Boarding homes are profit-making ventures, not state institutions which can be checked by the taxpayers. Many boarding homes, however bad, are licensed simply because there are not enough homes for the aged.

What can you do? You can go to your city council. Tell them you want established a department governing boarding homes for the elderly. You want laws enforcing clean sheets and clothes and warmth for old bones. You want bathtubs safe for old legs. Platform fire escapes. A limit on the number of boarders per room. You want your church and shut-in societies to provide recreation.

You know what I want? I want to see you lose your temper. I want to see you work up a bellowing, shouting, fiery rage! From Boston to Oregon I want to hear you yelling:

"Turn on the heat in that dump on Eagle Street! Get some soap and water and clean up that Maple Avenue rest home! Tell the fellow who owns the Happy Haven to serve decent food or you won't license him! Order clean sheets for that joint on Marshall Street! My mother is in there!"

mayonnaise to bind, and salt and pepper to taste. Don't add too much mayonnaise. This should be a thick spread. Serve in a bowl with two spreaders, and surround with buttered slices of party rye. Have some large corn chips near for scooping. The chopping can be done a day in advance.

VEAL ROLLS PICCATA

Get 2 veal cutlets ½" thick; ask your butcher to remove the small bone and pound them to ¼" thickness. It's a good idea to order these in advance so you will be sure to get large ones. Also get 1½ pounds veal ground three times—any cut will do for this—½ pound sliced cold boiled ham or prosciutto and two ½-pound balls Mozzarella cheese. To the ground veal add 1 raw egg, 1 teaspoon sweet basil, 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate, 1 teaspoon paprika, ½ teaspoon cayenne pepper, 1½ teaspoons salt and 4 tablespoons finely chopped parsley. Mix thoroughly—and I don't think you can do this successfully without using your hands.

Spread the cutlets out on a board, pinching meat together where the bone was removed, and cover completely with thin slices of ham. Put half of the ground veal on each cutlet and pat with your hands to make a smooth layer. Cut Mozzarella into thin slices and put a layer over the ground veal. Mozzarella is rather hard to cut and it helps to dip the knife into hot water as you go along. Now, starting at the narrow ends, roll the cutlets as you would a jelly roll. Tie with twine many times around and a couple of times the long way. They will look like miniature rolled roasts. Prepare the rolls for cooking the day before and store in the refrigerator.

To cook, sauté the rolls in butter on all sides, put them in a baking dish with a tight lid and add 1½ cups chicken broth, one 4-ounce can mushrooms cut into small pieces and ½ cup white raisins. If you like, several tablespoons Marsala wine may be added. Cover and bake in a moderate—350° F.—oven until tender, about 1 hour and 20 minutes. During cooking, turn the rolls over several times so they will remain round. Take rolls out of broth and let them stand at room temperature about 15 minutes. They need to cool a little before being sliced. Remove twine and cut into slices a little more than 1" thick.

Lay slices on aluminum foil, cover with another piece of foil, seal tightly by crimping edges. This keeps the meat from drying out while it's keeping hot in the oven. Serve the meat on a platter garnished with parsley or water cress and lemon slices and serve the broth separately in a bowl to be ladled on the meat as a thin gravy.

TOMATO SAUCE

Heat 3 tablespoons olive oil; add 1 cup finely chopped onion, ¼ cup chopped celery and 2 cloves garlic, minced. Sauté until onion is transparent but not brown. Add a 1-pound can tomatoes, 1 small can tomato paste, 1 cup water, 1 scant teaspoon orégano, 1 teaspoon salt, 1½ teaspoons sugar and 1 teaspoon crushed dried red pepper. Cover and cook gently 1 hour. Taste for seasoning and correct if you like. The sauce can be made in advance—I think that it improves with standing—and that's one more job out of the way.

Get 1 pound green noodles. If they're not available, use linguine or spaghetti. Cook in boiling salted water until tender but still firm. Mix with sauce and keep hot over gently boiling water. The cooking of the noodles is as nearly a last-minute job as you can manage conveniently. Serve with grated Parmesan cheese to which people can help themselves.

GREEN SALAD WITH GARLIC CROUTONS

Get a variety of salad greens; wash and store in refrigerator so they will be crisp. Be sure the greens are thoroughly dried before you mix the salad. This is terribly important because a watery salad is no good. Toast 3 slices white bread and rub both sides with a large clove of garlic. The rough texture of the toast acts as a grater for the garlic. While the toast is still hot remove crusts, cut into ½" squares and put them in a low—200° F.—oven until all moisture is removed. Make French dressing however you like. My favorite recipe is ¾ cup olive or salad oil, ¼ cup wine vinegar, 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon freshly ground black pepper, 1 teaspoon paprika and a pinch of sugar. Toss dressing and greens with a folding motion until all leaves are coated, add garlic croutons and toss a little more.

POPPY-SEED ROLLS

You can buy these in a bakery or grocery store; but if you like poppy seeds as well as I do, get plain rolls, brush tops with beaten egg and sprinkle on the poppy seeds with a very generous hand. Slip rolls into a paper sack, poppy seeds up, fold or tie opening of sack and heat in a moderate—350° F.—oven before serving.

No adjustment of human affairs will work perfectly and under all circumstances. If nature had provided any such arrangement, it would have been discovered long ago and we should all have gone to sleep. No form of government will save us from our own faults. If the commonwealth is to prosper, we have each our own parts to play. It is the continual struggle, the continual necessity to watch our own lives, which gives spirit and force to human existence.

JAMES A. FROUDE

PINEAPPLE MÉLANGE

I've eaten and served fresh pineapple cut in various ways, but the first time I had very thinly sliced pineapple was last year in Brussels, and I do think it was extra good. With the thin slices you don't get such a mouthful at one time. Well, to get on with the recipe:

Get a large ripe pineapple—and they are available at this time of year. Peel and cut into slices about ⅛" thick. Remove hard centers and cut into wedges about 1" on the outside and ¼" on the inside. Grate a coconut—or buy canned grated coconut which is not sweetened. Defrost 1 package frozen raspberries.

To arrange the dessert, make an overlapping circle of pineapple wedges on dessert plates, leaving a fairly large circle in center. Fill center with a mound of coconut, indent a little and fill with raspberries. Over the pineapple pour some maple sirup. If you like, you can use a little kirsch on the pineapple.

Service. For this meal I think you should seat your guests at a table or tables. Whatever your technique for eating spaghetti or noodles may be—whether you use just a fork or a fork and spoon for winding—a little leaning over is indicated in order to get the forkful safely into your mouth. And in eating Italian pasta a forkful should really be a mouthful. A friend in Italy first taught us that you couldn't enjoy pasta properly unless you had a very big bite.

And one more word about the noodles, which seem to be causing all the trouble but are well worth it. If you have buffet service—and this dinner would make a very attractive buffet—it's a good idea to serve the noodles yourself. Otherwise people would have to put their plates down in order to serve themselves, which would delay proceedings. Delay we don't care for. When we have prepared a fine meal we want it to be eaten at its best. END

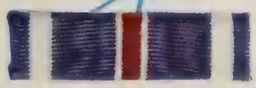
PAPRIKA



Would you like more color in stews and casserole dishes plus a subtle additional flavor? Then do what so many women do—use paprika.

Paprika is a sweet red pepper ground after the stem has been removed. It grows in Spain, Hungary and the United States. The Spanish variety is heat free. All paprika is mild and sweet in flavor and slightly aromatic.

It's an important ingredient in Chicken Paprika and Hungarian Goulash. Use it also in seafood, meats, vegetables, gravies, canapes; in salad dressings. It is a colorful red garnish for any pale foods.

Col. Fred G. Hook, commander, Otis Air Force Base, is as proud of jet pilot Chappie James as is his own family of four.

In the fourteen years of their marriage, Dorothy Watkins James has seen her husband rise from Air Force cadet to lieutenant colonel, commander of the 60th Fighter-Interceptor Squadron—the man who, voted the state's most outstanding young man of the year, received the Massachusetts Junior Chamber of Commerce Distinguished Service Award for 1955.

It takes a special brand of courage to stand by through the years while your husband pursues a career that often means separation, danger; to give your children the necessary inner security in a life filled with changes; to be, in short, what Dorothy's husband calls "the ideal Air Force wife."

The commander of Otis Air Force Base settled back in his chair and went on talking about Lt. Col. Daniel ("Chappie") James, commander of the 60th Fighter-Interceptor Squadron, one of the jet squadrons on which depends the air security of the East Coast, and one of the few virtually all-white outfits in the Air Force. "He's an outstanding pilot, a born leader," said Colonel Hook, "and a good guy. I'm proud of that boy. Discipline and efficiency are high in his squadron, maybe because he never expects his boys to do anything he can't do himself—and better."

Being a Negro and working up to commanding his own squadron was no easy job, as Chappie James readily admits. "Of course I got the breaks," he says, "but I couldn't have done it without Dottie." And you listen

Spud, Dottie, Spike and Danice accept irregular hours as part of Chappie's job. "Lots of times he leaves early in the morning and we don't see him until midnight."

My mother is really out of this world.

She's the greatest!

She always says:

"Show by your accomplishments that you are good and intelligent and worthy."

"Prove to the world that you can compete on an equal basis."

"See to it that your children get a better education than you got."

"Be prepared. Be ready to do whatever it is you want to do."

CARROLL SEGHERS II

"Dan's drive and talent all go back to his mother," says Dottie. "She's just a genius!" Hampered by rheumatism, Mrs. James still teaches in the school she founded more than fifty years ago. For Chappie's birthday, wherever he is, she sends his favorite cake—chocolate with pecans.

to their story and you know he speaks the truth.

Daniel and Dorothy James and their three children were then living in a converted barracks building at Otis Air Force Base on Cape Cod, Massachusetts. New quarters were being built on the base, but they would not be ready in time for the Jameses to occupy them. Chappie, although delighted with his new orders to Staff and Command School at Maxwell Air Force Base, Montgomery, Alabama, was regretfully taking leave of the squadron he has led since 1953.

Otis holds happy memories for the Jameses. Chappie has taken his responsibilities very seriously—"The squadron has to come first," Dottie says matter-of-factly; "sometimes he leaves early in the morning and we don't see him until midnight"—but all of them feel a natural interest and satisfaction in his work. It was at Otis that he was promoted first to major and then to lieutenant colonel. And at Otis their third child, "Spud," was born. That was the only time that Chappie had been able to be with his wife throughout her pregnancy and at delivery.

In the fourteen-year course of their marriage there have been many separations and many moves. "Dottie has stood it like a trouper," her husband says. Dottie smiles tranquilly, with obvious pride in her children and her dynamic, six-foot-four husband, who flew 101 aerial-combat missions in Korea, and won the Distinguished Flying Cross for extraordinary achievement while leading a ground-support mission in enemy territory. (The ribbons on his left chest also represent the Air Medal with seven oak-leaf clusters, the Korean Presidential Unit Citation, American Presidential Citation, and "a whole clutch of theater ribbons.")

Afternoon sun was glowing through the yellow kitchen curtains. The old barracks building is drab on the outside, but the Jameses' six-room apartment on the second floor had a happy lived-in look, with many touches of the warm yellow which is Dottie's favorite color.

"We'll be sorry to leave this one," Dottie said. "It has been our longest home. But," she added, "Air Force families get used to moving, you know."

Twelve-year-old Danice, setting the table, put in sagely, "My girl friend's family got moved last month. We just said 'Good-by' and 'Maybe we'll meet again someday.' Just like that—no crying or anything. It's something you've got to expect when you're Air Force." Danice moves her hands in explanatory gestures when she speaks. "It will be the same way when we leave. But as mother says, it's nice to know that maybe you'll run into old friends again when you go to a new place, and there are always more nice people to meet. I don't mind moving except that I hope we won't have to take any more shots."

The roar of a jet fighter seemed ominously close overhead, but Dottie didn't pause in her expert mixing of the salad. Ten-year-old Danny ("Spike") rushed to the window. "He's trying to break the sound barrier," he said in the sure tones of an expert. "Watch him go! If he does, all you'll hear will be just a little p't, p't."

The baby, nineteen-month-old Spud, tugged energetically at the bottom compartment of the upright freezer. Without turning to look at him, Dottie said mildly, "No, Spuddy, don't do that, dear." And Spud stopped instantly and went to seek more acceptable amusement.

At the obvious question—"How do you get such complete obedience from a baby?"—Dottie smiled and answered slowly, "Well, I don't exactly know. I guess we just expect them to be good children, and they are. We don't have many flat rules in this family. We try to talk things out with the children, and treat them with dignity and understanding. But about the only rule is that we never say 'can't' or 'won't.'"

Spike helped himself to a glass of milk from the refrigerator. "If I get discouraged and want to give up on something, she always says, 'There's nothing you can't do if you really want to, because'"—his voice dropped into a comic mimicry of Dottie's quiet tones—"'you're an intelligent little boy.'" He flashed a bright grin. "Boy, my mother's the greatest!" he announced, and darted out toward the playground.

Dorothy Watkins grew up in Tuskegee, Alabama, where her father, a former teacher, has worked for thirty years in the machine shop at the Veterans Hospital. He was the undisputed head of his

"We don't teach so much as give them an opportunity to learn," says Col. Alvan C. Gillam II, of Staff and Command School. Dottie, as politely, said "No," and oment later was dancing with some- else. Each new dance found Chappie repeating the invitation, until finally she consented to dance with him.

"I asked if I could accompany her home, and she said I could see her to the gate, but there her father would pick her up. Her father yet!" Chappie chortles in his deep baritone.

"That wasn't all," he continues. "You see, I figured the reason I was getting the bum's rush from this baby-faced chick was that she just didn't know who I was. So on the way out, I informed her that I was Chappie James—the Daniel James, Junior—football hero! But she knew all the time, and I'm telling you you never saw anyone so crushed as I was when she got through with me. 'So you're Chappie James,' she said. 'Well, I don't think you're so hot!' She said a lot more, about my being conceited and stuck up, and by that time we were at the gate. And sure enough, there was her father waiting for her in the car. I knew that night that I wanted to marry her. Dottie was different, you see."

Chappie had come to Tuskegee from Pensacola, Florida, where he was born, the youngest of seventeen children. His father, who died the year young Daniel finished high school, was foreman of the Pensacola coal-gas plant. His mother, Lillie Anna James, graduated from Catholic High School in Pensacola, and has educated herself further through correspondence courses. More than fifty years ago she established the L. A. James Private School next door to their home. She taught all her children through eighth grade and, though now in her late seventies and crippled with painful rheumatism, she is still teaching from her wheel chair.

"We can't make her stop," says Chappie. "If you want a story about a really interesting personality, you should write about my mother. She is really out of this world! She's the greatest! She has the most indomitable spirit I've ever seen. She really goes for that old business, 'The impossible we do right now.' My mother believes that the eventual end of segregation depends on Negro achievement. 'Prove to the world that you can compete on an equal basis,' she says. 'Show by your accomplishments that you are good and intelligent and worthy. I don't say don't fight it with legislation or with any other proper means, but I don't say you'll do much good that way either. Achievement will do it.'

"She's really hipped on education. 'See to it that your children get a better education than you got,' she says. 'Push each generation a little further educationally. Keep pushing them up and keep pushing them up and who knows where you'll have the Jameses?'

"And she's a bug on preparation. 'Be prepared,' she drums into you. 'Be ready to do whatever it is you want to do. I have no patience with people who sit around and wail that the world never gives them an opportunity. Then when the opportunity comes, they wail, "Oh, but I never expected this and I am not ready. You must give me time to prepare myself." You have to be ready.' She never lets up. She really is terrific."

Says Colonel James, "I grew up in an area where you had to fight—I learned to fight before I learned to walk. I had a hair-trigger temper, and developed a habit of swinging first and asking questions later. A long time ago Dottie made me promise to control my temper, and I do now—somewhat. I've worked very hard at it, and I've come a long way. I can sort of let things roll off now." He added, with a smile at his wife, "Dottie is a sort of safety valve for me all around. Friends won't tell you your faults, but I've asked Dottie to tell me, and by George, she'll do it too. Coming home after a party, she'll maybe say, 'Honey, I think you dominated the conversation too much tonight.' And I'll think back, and she's right. Dottie has had a lot to do with making me whatever sort of gentleman I am."

On that Memorial Day in Tuskegee, Dottie wasn't planning to have anything at all to do with Chappie James. But he besieged her with telephone calls, and hounded her friends to "tell her something nice about me," until at last she went to a movie with him. Three years later she agreed to marry him.

Dorothy's sister, Aubrey, was the only member of her family present at her wedding. She was so in awe of her father that she didn't tell him she was going to be married. Her mother knew, but didn't attend the wedding because then her father would have known something was going on, and Dottie was terribly afraid he would say no because she was so young. Asked, "If he had forbidden it, would you have married Chappie anyway?" she considered thoughtfully and then said, "No, I don't suppose I would."

Dressed in her gold silk "Sunday dress," and wearing a corsage of chrysanthemums, Dorothy was married to Chappie in a quiet ceremony at the chaplain's home at Tuskegee on November 3, 1942. By this time Chappie had graduated from Tuskegee's civilian pilot-training school and had his first job teaching primary training to Air Force cadets at Moton Field, Alabama. After a quiet wedding dinner at Dorothy's home (informed of the marriage by the tense groom, Dorothy's dad only said mildly, "Well, I guess you know what you're doing") Chappie went back to his job, and Dottie continued to live at home and work toward her spring graduation; her new husband spent every weekend that he could manage in Tuskegee.

Soon Chappie grew restless watching the men he'd trained go off to war. Early in 1943 he volunteered for the Army Air Corps, and was accepted. Integration in the armed forces had not yet been put into effect, and certain minor officials had definite ideas about Negroes who sought to be pilots. It was a difficult period for Chappie, in spite of his previous qualification as a civilian pilot. One weekend he came home visibly discouraged and ready to give up.

"You told me from the first that you wanted to be an Air Force pilot," Dorothy told him firmly. "You knew all along it wouldn't be easy. But I know you can do it. So go back there and face up to whatever it is that is making you unhappy. And don't you come back to me until you bring me those wings!"

He brought them to her in six months instead of the customary nine.

To be happy with a man you must understand him a lot and love him a little; to be happy with a woman you must love her a lot and not try to understand her at all.

HELEN ROWLAND

"Those first few years it seemed we were always moving," the Jameses recall. Whenever Chappie expected to remain a reasonable length of time in one place, Dottie went with or followed him. "When he moved again, I'd go back home to Tuskegee to wait for the next call."

It was during one of these waiting periods that their first child was born in the Tuskegee campus hospital. Dottie's mother, a nurse's aide, was with her in the hospital, but Chappie was stationed at Selfridge Field, Michigan, with the 99th Fighter Squadron. He was away on a cross-country flight and didn't receive news that he was a father until Danice was two days old.

Asked, "How did you feel, not hearing from your husband at a time like that? What did you do?" Dorothy answered serenely, "I waited. I knew he'd call when he could."

She waited at home again when Spike was to be born. In the interim there had been temporary homes in many places, including Selfridge Field; Mather Field, California; Freeman Field, Indiana; and Godman Field, Kentucky. Daniel James III arrived in the Tuskegee Air Force Hospital. Chappie was then stationed in Kentucky, and he flew down to Tuskegee with a duffel bag full of baby clothes and a diamond engagement ring. (He couldn't afford one before they were married. Dottie wore his class ring on a chain.)

In 1946 Chappie received orders to Lockbourne Field, at Columbus, Ohio, and the happy two years with the family united stretched invitingly before them. But no quarters were available on the base, and Chappie was able to find only a one-room apartment. Leaving nine-month-old Danny with his delighted grandmother in Tuskegee, Dottie and Danice moved in. It was several months before they obtained quarters and could bring Danny to Lockbourne.

"Somehow," Dottie remembers, "that was one of the worst times of all for me. You learn to take things in stride when you're a service wife. You have to get used to your husband's being away, and going off to war. And you get used to disappointments—or rather you learn to avoid them by not making plans ahead and just living from day to day. I hated not having Chappie there when the first two were born, but this was, I guess, the thing that hit me hardest. When we got Danny back he didn't know his daddy at all! He only knew a picture as daddy, and this giant with the deep voice frightened him terribly. Danny was so tiny, and Dan was so big, and he'd boom out, 'Come to me, I'm your father,' and Danny would cry, and I'd cry too. I guess it's funny now, but it certainly wasn't funny to me then. It nearly broke my heart."

The Jameses have never had any in-law trouble. Both families lovingly approved their marriage. "It was wonderful, when I had to be away, knowing that Dottie's parents were there to help look out for her and the children," Chappie says. Tragedy struck in 1948 just before Danice's fourth birthday. Her Grandmother Watkins had mailed a birthday gift, when she was stricken with a cerebral hemorrhage. Dorothy thinks that her mother with her nurse's training, probably recognized what was wrong. Mrs. Watkins drove herself to the doctor's office, sat down and quietly died.

Lieutenant Colonel James (then a first lieutenant) was ordered to the Philippines in September, 1949, and once again Dottie and the children returned to Tuskegee. Her father, alone in the once-busy house, was doubly glad to have them with him.

Chappie was attached to an integrated unit at Clark Air Field. "It made me feel, for the first time, that I was really in the Air Force." But the day he arrived on Luzon, he wandered into the officers' club and found himself the only Negro there. No one approached him or spoke to him. He admits now that it was the loneliest few minutes he has ever spent.

A small combo was beating out a rhythm on the platform, and Chappie unconsciously nodded in time to the music. When the piece stopped, the saxophonist, also a first lieutenant, jumped off the bandstand and made his way to Chappie. "Hey, mop," he greeted him in "hep" language, "my name's Taylor. What's yours?"

"I'm Dan James."

"Do you blow, man?" asked Taylor enthusiastically.

"No, but I'm a mighty good listener."

That was the beginning of a deep and lasting friendship between these two young pilots of different races. The exuberant little Texan's name was Claude Taylor, but everyone called him Spud. "Try to get the Twelfth," he told Chappie, "that's mine." And he persuaded Chappie later to sing with the combo, popular numbers that went over well in Chappie's deep baritone. "Spud was one of the finest guys I've ever known," says Chappie, "the best friend I ever had."

Chappie did a lot of bragging to Spud and other buddies about his pretty wife, and when Dottie and the children arrived in February, 1950, a delegation was at the dock to welcome them. Unfortunately, Dottie had been seasick every day of the twenty-one-day voyage; Danice had succumbed also—only four-year-old Danny had successfully weathered the trip. "You never saw such a bedraggled creature as my 'pretty wife' in all your born days!" Chappie chuckles.

He had found pleasant quarters at Clark Field, and Dottie again set up housekeeping—this time with the aid of servants. "Such luxury!" she recalls. "I'd never had help before—nor since." A little Filipino girl looked after the house, and her brother was "yard boy," taking care of the grounds where wild orchids, fuchsia and hibiscus hedges, banana and mango trees grew in exotic profusion. Spud and his wife, Hazelle, lived just two doors away. They had no children of their own, bu "were just wonderful to ours." Danice an Danny were in and out of the two houses with easy impartiality.

In all their travels, the Jameses have me with remarkably few instances of openly dis played racial prejudice. Perhaps the mos significant incident occurred soon after the arrival at Clark Field, when school opene for children on the base.

The first morning, Danice walked over t join her new classmates waiting on the corne for the school bus. Without speaking, ever child crossed to the other side. She again trie to get acquainted, and was deserted the secon time. Danice did not mention the incident t her parents. She stood her isolation alone until Hazelle Taylor happened to look fron her kitchen window one morning. Disturbed she told Spud when he came home tha Danice was being ostracized. Spud set out furious visits to the homes of several of th parents.

"We didn't know anything about the epi sode until months later," says Chappie, "an we still don't know what Spud told them. Bu after that, the kids accepted Danice. Kids ar O.K. if you don't give them the wrong idea We try very hard to help ours to judge peopl as individuals—and on worth alone."

The Korean War began, and Chappie vol unteered for combat duty. But that first tim he was rejected. "Volunteer again," Dotti said, knowing how badly her husband wante in. But there was another delay. First Lieu tenant James took off from Clark Field on morning on a routine flight in a T-33. He ha barely left the ground when the jet plan exploded under him and crashed in high gras about a mile from the runway.

He woke up in the hospital to hear th nurse saying firmly, "You can't go in there He's in shock."

"Little girl, you can't stop me," and Spu pushed his way inside. "Man, I saw you!" h greeted Chappie. "Just trying to be spectacu lar, that's all."

The chaplain called Dottie and said, "Mrs James, your husband has had an accident He's in the hospital, but he's going to be al right."

"That was all I really heard," Dottie re members, "just that he was all right. Tha was all that mattered."

Chappie's back had been injured, but a soon as he was well he volunteered again fo Korean service. This time he was accepted and once more Dottie and the children re turned to Tuskegee to wait.

Captain James flew 101 combat missions i Korea. Some Korean veterans still talk of th time he spent as forward ground observe directing aircraft to targets, when from a foxhole Old Man River would rise in Chap pie's clear baritone above the din of shells an bombs. Dottie wrote to him every day—gay newsy and loving letters. "Unless you've bee out there, you can't realize how much i means to have a wife like her behind you," Chappie says. "Her letters were the one thing that helped me when Spud was killed." Gay exuberant Spud had lost his life while bailing out over enemy territory, and for a while Chappie was bitterly disrupted emotionally a the loss of the best friend he'd ever had.

In December, 1951, the James family wa together again, at Otis Air Force Base, where Chappie had duty as an all-weather jet pilot Soon he was made operations officer for th 58th Fighter Squadron, was promoted t major in 1953. The same year he became commander of the 437th (later the 60th) Squadron, a job in which he continued until selected as one of the 890 officers to attend Staff and Command School at Maxwell.

Staff and Command School is no picnic The officers who attend, recommended by their commands and carefully selected by a screening board in Washington, spend nine months in intensive study and analysis. I try never to let his work set me; for a good marriage, you have to able to give and take." She smiled. "But metimes I do think wives have to give and ke a little more."

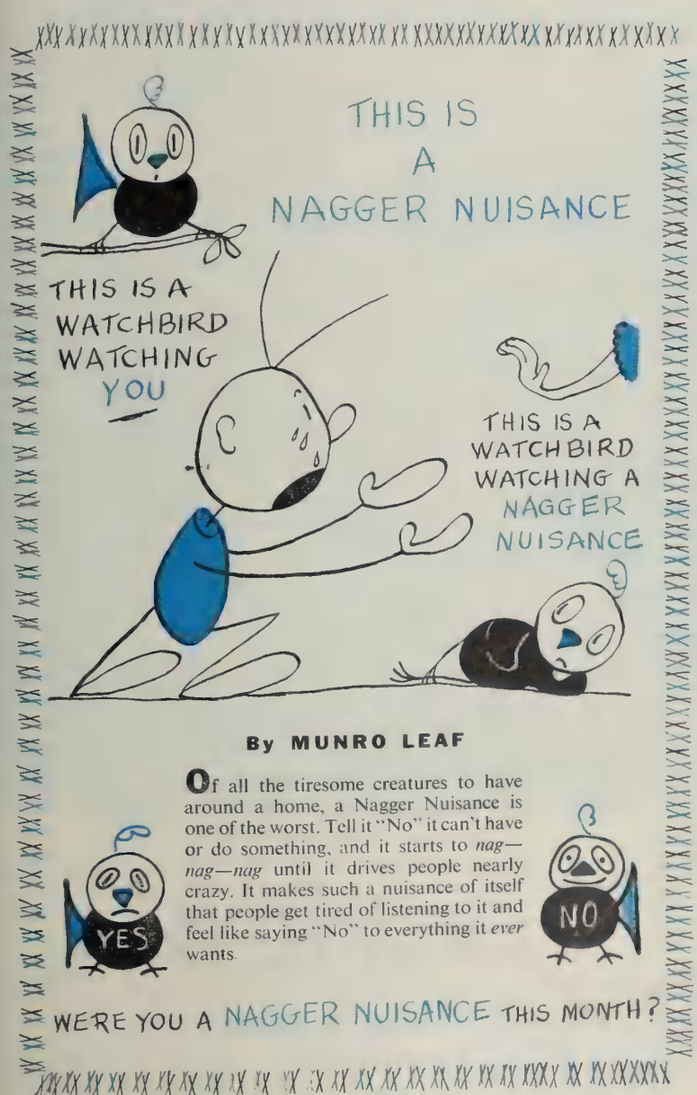
Chappie always remembers Christmas, wedng anniversaries and Mother's Day, but constently forgets Dottie's birthday. ("Maybe 's being tactful," Dottie says.) For their st wedding anniversary he gave her a watch hich she wore for years, finally lost in a eater. Last anniversary he gave her another ne. As a parting gift before going off to orea, he brought her a handsome sapphire ring, set with pearls and diamonds. e cherishes the ring highly, but her very ost favorite of all the presents Chappie has ven her is the white leather coat with brilnt red lining which he picked out himself New Bedford.

Chappie is a gregarious person—"He likes eople, makes friends easily, likes to sing"—nd his squadron at Otis was a close-knit, iendly group. Social life ranged from inrmal drop-in visits to occasional formal parties at the club. Almost any Saturday night saw some form of party going on. "Our men work hard," says Dottie. "They need fun. We plan parties to give them a chance to relax, but almost all parties end up the same way—with the men off in one corner flying planes and the wives in another group. It happens everywhere."

For her own parties, Dottie likes to serve a buffet dinner centered around the family's favorite dish, creole gumbo, which Chappie's mother taught her to make. Sometimes for sit-down dinners she introduces Northern palates to a Southern menu of fried chicken and grits. She is an excellent cook who has mastered the knack of making simple dishes taste like something special.



The advent of their third child at Otis was somewhat of a surprise—there's a gap of more than eight years between Spike and Spud. "It was wonderful!" Dottie recalls. "I'd had the other two alone, but this time Dan was there all the time, worrying and fussing over me. At the hospital he was so nervous that finally the doctor told him, 'Now, I don't tell you how to fly planes. And don't you try to tell me how to deliver babies.'

"I wanted another girl," Dottie continues, "but Dan had his heart set on a second boy. He told me, 'Get me a boy, honey, and I'll buy you a mink.' I haven't got it yet, though." At the moment the yellow roses which he brought her with a note, "You're the greatest!" seemed even more rewarding. She's doing pretty well for coats while she waits for the mink—in addition to the white leather one, she has a handsome red belted-back coat with Milium lining, a black wool fitted dress coat, and a muskrat cape which she wears for evening and with suits.

Spud's name, which he is never called, is Claude Andrew—Andrew for Dottie's father, Claude for Spud Taylor. The first Spud seems to have willed his disposition to his namesake. Little Spud is a laughing charmer, small imp and streak of lightning all rolled into one. On the Cape, whenever his mother turned her back for a minute and he could find the screen door unlocked, he would sneak out, dash down the outside stairway, and off to some remote section of the housing area. "He'd go over to the playground," Dottie says, "and eat sand." Spud laughs a lot. He races about the house, banking like a plane and going, "Boom, boom, BOOOOOOM!" He says, "Eye, nose, mouth," pointing to his own features. He sings constantly (on key), "Habby budday do you." It is doubtful if Spud has ever met a stranger.

Obedience seems to come naturally to the James children. They are not talked down to, but requests are made firmly and politely—and are obeyed. They are aware that their parents have high standards, for themselves and for their children, and they

In his own small way, this child is showing he has taste . . . a taste for Welch's . . . lots of Welch's . . . all the Welch's he can get his little hands on.

But that's the way it is with fussy eaters and Welch's. They just can't seem to get enough of that extra grapey flavor they always find in Welch's spreads.

If your youngster is a fussy eater—and most kids are—watch what happens to that fussy appetite when you spread a sandwich thick with Welch's Grape Jelly . . . or, with wonderful Grapelade, Welch's exclusive grape jam.

On sandwiches—on biscuits—in omelettes—over pancakes—on desserts—or, on fingers, Welch's Grape Jelly and Grapelade are the most delicious treats your child can have quick-Cooked corn is here

Our "Mr. 5 x 5" can (it's as wide as it's tall) tells you this corn is vacuum packed. Every kernel stays crisp. You get as many servings as in taller liquid-packed cans. And you don't pour vitamins and minerals down the drain.

You know how good cooks (and nutrition authorities) say to cook vegetables. Quick. So you keep the flavor, color, and nourishment.

Well, the Green Giant has now found a way to quick-cook his Niblets Brand corn.

The corn races through a new kind of pressure cooker on a mile-long spiral track. In almost as little time as it takes to tell, it's done.

The result is pretty wonderful. All the flavor and fun of a fresh roastin' ear. Only thing missing is the cob. New Niblets. Just heat, serve, and let yourself go.

hare those ideals. Spike mentioned that at chool this year a certificate was offered to ny child who read five books. It was clearly pparent that if any award was being given, pike felt he had to get it. "I didn't even know bout it until the last week of school," he aid, "and I had to read five books in a week!" pike wants to go to the Air Force Academy, neans to be a jet pilot—"the greatest, like ny dad." He evidently has never considered he possibility that there is anything else to e. At Otis, Danny tagged after his father to he line at every possible chance. "He lived lown at the hangar," Dottie says. "You'd be urprised how much Spike has taught me bout jets."

The two older children used to get an allow- nce of $1 each payday. Last winter, in an ffort to bolster Danny's interest in science nd arithmetic ("He needs them both in this echnological age, especially if he's going to e an airman"), Chappie instituted a system vhereby he would pay $3 for each A on a eport card and $1 for each B. For a C they ad to pay him $6. "They nearly broke me ip," he says with rueful pride. "The first nonth Danny had to fork over $12 for his cience and arithmetic, but after that he never nade another C. Danice made no C's and lmost all A's." Danice and Spike augment his easy money by baby-sitting, with Spud nd neighbors' children; they have generously given up their $1 allowances—they have plenty of money. They bought their own English bikes, and last spring Danice proudly bought ner first pair of shoes with heels—white pumps with minuscule heels—for $8.95. Danny s always saving for something, currently for a BB gun.

A lieutenant colonel with fourteen years in service, Chappie gets $925.08 per month, in- cluding flight pay, so the Jameses have no special financial problems. "But we've always managed on whatever we made," says Dottie. "That is, all except at Lockbourne. Chappie borrowed money from a finance company to buy furniture and we were so sorry! And he was club officer on the base there, and cashed a check that bounced. We had to make it up, and we just didn't know where to find the money. Daddy bailed us out of that one, and we've never borrowed a cent since then."

It was at Lockbourne, too, that they started the college fund for the children, to which Dottie adds almost every payday. She handles all the bills and the joint bank account—"It takes the bother off Chappie; and besides, my husband is so casual about money. It just leaves him. This way there's no strain except that sometimes he forgets to tell me about a check he's written, so my accounts don't balance."

The Jameses own two cars, a '52 Cadillac and a new red Thunderbird which is Chappie's pride. They considered two cars a necessity at Otis, since Chappie had to have immediate transportation always available in case of an alert. The Cadillac is paid for; they pay $85 per month on the Thunderbird. On the long move to Alabama they drove the two cars in tandem; Spud rode with Dottie in the Cadillac, and Spike and Danice took frequent turns with their father in the Thunderbird. "Keeping up with Chappie and keeping Spud happy was quite a job," Dottie says. "I was absolutely worn out when we reached Tuskegee around midnight. But there was daddy waiting up, with the most wonderful hot dinner all ready for us. He'd made corn muffins, and he had okra and corn on the cob, and pig ears. I never tasted anything so good!"

Dottie tries hard to see that the children don't feel their father's frequent absences too keenly. In Massachusetts, when Danice and Danny were not in school, she would drive them to nearby New Bedford to shop and go to the amusement park or the movies. Then they'd have dinner in a restaurant, with Dottie always ordering the sea food she loves. When Chappie was home he would take the whole family to baseball games—they're all fans—or they'd have a cookout, with Chappie expertly barbecuing the steaks. Now in Tuskegee on his rare evenings with his family, "we mostly just talk." Once Dottie has taken the children to the base to see their father. At home Grandfather Watkins does amiable duty as a substitute for Chappie; his expert machinist's hands know exactly what an ailing bicycle needs.

Although the Jameses adapt themselves to life wherever Air Force duty takes them, they cherish a special fondness for Massachusetts. They are honorary citizens of North Falmouth; would like, someday, to build a home there when Chappie retires. (That won't be for a long time. Chappie hopes to "stay for thirty.") Dottie dreams of a modern ranch-style house, with no steps, no upstairs, spacious big rooms and loads of big closets—"We're all so big! And I'd like a nice big basement with a big playroom. But I honestly can't imagine living in one place and never having to move again!"

"Oh, no," she answered quickly a query about special hobbies. "I read when I have the time. But I have no talent. It's Dan and the children who do the things. I just take care of them."

The Jameses were spending Christmas, 1955, with Chappie's family in Pensacola when the news arrived announcing Chappie's promotion to lieutenant colonel.

Everyone was surprised and excited but Dottie; Chappie says, "I couldn't figure her. She just said, 'I'm glad, dear,' and went about her business."

Let down, he trailed after her to find out why she wasn't more enthusiastic.

"I am happy, Dan," she told him, "but not surprised. I've been expecting this for ages. I just wonder what took them so long, that's all."

It is this unflagging faith in her husband that makes him reiterate his son's statement: "Dottie? She's the greatest!"

Just before saying good night, he said quietly, "Every day I thank God for Dottie; you write that. Thank God for Dottie!"

"I'm enclosing my own story, which could be labeled the case of the drudge. . . . I am still having fun despite the fact that now I am that other woman the sociologists are worrying over, the one with the 'empty nest.'"

■ On a ranch in Brownlee, Nebraska, Grace Lee and husband Forrest faced poverty, blizzards and sandstorms with four small daughters in "God's Own Cow Country"—a land that was wonderful for men but rough on horses and women. When you pumped water, fought snakes, cooked for nineteen people, and walked six miles for the mail for a "night out," you had to be able to say—to stay:

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

I suggested he return west with us for a three weeks' visit. Kyle and I rode tourist class and I used the savings to pay his fare. Although my father-in-law had just sold the home place for a fair price, he didn't offer to buy his own ticket, and he didn't stay with us three weeks. He stayed six months.

"During that time my father-in-law had trouble with his teeth. I arranged for a dentist to make a denture for him; I was allowed a courtesy rate and the five-hundred-dollar denture was billed at three hundred dollars. My father-in-law was delighted with his new teeth, but refused to pay for them, and my husband also refused. In order to maintain my reputation at the hospital, I entered Kyle in a nursery boarding school, took on a twenty-four-hour private case and finally, after several weeks, I paid the dentist in full. Nils said I was a chump for letting his dad get the best of me; his father said I was foolish not to let the dentist whistle for his money.

"I just can't understand people like Nils and his father. People who take and won't give, except for show. Nils has turned Christmas, once my favorite holiday, into a nightmare by howling over the gifts I buy with my own earnings for my family. He ignores the fact they always send him and me and Kyle fine presents. He thinks Christmas is a ridiculous money trap and that my devotion to my family is sentimental slop.

"I met Nils through his older sister; she was my hospital supervisor in Baltimore and she frequently spoke about her kid brother who was a B-seventeen tail gunner overseas. When Aline wrote to him I would sometimes add a gag postscript. And when he came back I was attracted by his good looks and his uniform. I even liked the fact he talked very little. I didn't know the time would come when I would deliberately smash a plate and scream at him to say something, say anything to me. During our courtship his kisses were hurried, awkward and rare. Perhaps I should have known then he wasn't really affectionate. Sex is all that interests him. And sex without tenderness has very little appeal to me.

"I thought marriage would change Nils, that he would become gentle and sweet, less silent, more enthusiastic and demonstrative. We have now been married ten years, and he hasn't changed a particle. Weeks go by when he doesn't kiss me. I've got some spirit too. If Nils won't kiss me, I can't see why I should share his bed. When we moved into our new house, I moved into a separate bedroom.

"Nils is a hero among the people he works with. Despite his manhandling of our finances—he paid eight hundred dollars for the landscaping of our grounds to impress the neighbors, but we do not have a living-room sofa for them to sit on—he is a wizard at talking other people into budgets and persuading them to settle accounts his company has labeled uncollectible. Everybody says his rapid rise is due to his understanding of human nature. All day long he listens sympathetically to strangers' tales of woe. He won't listen to me for three minutes.

"He is fantastically closemouthed, even in matters most men would boast about. Not long ago, going through an old suitcase, I discovered he had been decorated several times for bravery in World War Two. This was something he never mentioned. When I asked him where his medals were, he just shrugged his shoulders.

"Twice in two years he has taken Kyle to the circus without me. He seems to think it unmanly to share any type recreation with a wife. Many evenings he arrives home late, mumbling he's been held up at his office. At times this may be true. Other evenings I'm sure he goes to some movie he wants to see. He attends night football games and wrestling matches without me. On Saturdays he bowls in city-wide competitions; I've never been invited to watch him.

"Nils and I have practically no friends. Nils is anything but helpful. Last Saturday our nearest neighbors dropped in. When Nils stalked outside and began to clip a hedge that required no clipping, our neighbors took the hint and left. Sometimes his behavior is just the opposite. On two occasions he virtually forced money on acquaintances who didn't ask for loans and plainly had no way of repaying them. Then he got furious with me when I asked why he didn't apply his public business judgments to our private affairs.

"I know I complain of Nils too much and start too many fights. I used to be even-tempered, but it has become almost impossible for me to control myself. Nils' indifference to anything I say or do makes me feel as though I were married to a man of wood. I fly off the handle at trifles. I nag and scold, but I never reach him.

"Before we adopted our son, we had all sorts of medical tests to determine the cause of our inability to have children. Neither of us appears to be sterile. Perhaps our genes aren't mutually compatible.

"I had hopes our adopting Kyle would draw us closer together. My hopes weren't fulfilled. A strange thing is that Nils objected vigorously to adopting a baby—he declared it was absurd to support somebody else's child—but he has turned into as soft a father as I've ever seen. Too soft, in fact. Our small boy seems to be the only human being in the world Nils is capable of loving. He spoils Kyle. Our son is three years and seven months old and still isn't toilet-trained because Nils read a book about the danger of repressing children and won't let me train him.

"I feel a special obligation to provide Kyle with a normal home and not to rob him of his father. But right now I doubt that Nils and I can create a normal home. Although Kyle is very young, I think he already senses our disharmony. Nils confuses me and I suppose I confuse him. Possibly if he and I could understand each other we could hold our home together for the sake of our child."

Nils tells his side:

"Patsy's foolishness is the main thing wrong," said thirty-six-year-old Nils. Slim-hipped, blond-browed, his lake-blue eyes steadily refused to meet the counselor's. "My wife's tiresome chatter on romance and the ideal marriage puts me in mind of a disk jockey. After ten years, it seems to me she should be willing for us to act like a settled couple instead of a pair of moon-struck teenagers. But Patsy is Irish—my family is Scandinavian—and, boy, do the Irish go in for fireworks! They're either crying or laughing and they're always celebrating some darn thing or the other. Believe it or not, a week ago Patsy had to rush out and buy a gift because a nephew of hers was graduating from a Baltimore junior-high school. It was May before we paid the last of the Christmas bills for stuff her family didn't need. She sent her mother a sewing machine when she could use a sewing machine herself to make nice clothes for Kyle.

"In my family Christmas was strictly reserved for kids, and my father saw to it the twelve of us were promoted to adulthood very early. Before the depression he owned a machine shop, employed a dozen men, and felt like a big shot. Then everything fell apart and he fell apart too. Our next-door neighbor rustled around and took any odd job available to feed his family. Not my dad. When people came to our house to offer him day work, he would lie in bed and holler at my mother, 'Tell them I'm not here.'

"Pretty soon we were on relief. In a big family somebody is always caught in the middle and that's where I was. I guess my mother did her best. But at times I would feel kind of desperate trying to get her to take notice of me in some special way. What way didn't matter.

"Once I stole a bicycle. When I rode the bike home my mother was in the back yard. Finally she noticed me riding up and down, and asked where the bicycle had come from. I told her my friend, Billy, had given it to me—a thing she could have known wasn't true. I had no friend named Billy, and boys don't give away good bicycles. 'Oh, that was nice of Billy,' my mother said, and went on hanging up the wash. What I wanted from her was a lecture on honesty, or even a beating. To me it seemed she didn't care if I was a thief or not.

"When I started to high school I carried a morning paper route and the ten dollars a month I earned was contributed to the family. My allowance was ten cents a week. We were living in the Pennsylvania coal country, and we kids were supposed to put in late afternoons along the railroad tracks picking up the anthracite that dropped off the coal cars. I was a good athlete and was determined to be a professional baseball player. I stayed after school for practice, and this kept me in constant hot water with the family.

"In my junior year, in a three-state track meet, I broke a broad-jump record which had stood for seventeen years. I got praise from the coach and was interviewed by the newspaper. I was awarded a little silver cup and carried it home to my mother. She looked at the cup and said, 'You should have been picking coal this afternoon. My stove is empty.'

"I didn't finish high school. It was a relief to join the Civilian Conservation Corps and to eat three square meals a day and wear a good pair of shoes. I kept eight dollars of my earnings every month, and that was wonderful. Twenty-two dollars was sent home. Only my sister Aline ever thanked me. For some reason she acted fond of me.

"My gang and I were shipped to New Mexico, where we cleared and made all the trails around the Carlsbad Caverns. There was one handicap to the CCC. After a six months' hitch you had to get out so other guys could join up and get the three square meals a day. I liked the West and I wanted to stay.

"My buddy and I worked out an angle. We lifted our service records from the filing room in New Mexico and rode the rods to Oregon. We joined the CCC there and spent six months clearing the forests around Mount Hood. In the middle of our third hitch—we were then near San Francisco—the CCC caught up with us and we were done.

"I enlisted in the Army Air Forces and was with them six years. I was based in England when I flew my first combat mission. I flew my last mission out in the Pacific theater after the European war was over. At long last I came home on a furlough. I had been gone about eight years. When I walked in the door, my mother said 'Hello.' She didn't even pat me on the shoulder. I decided to cut my furlough short.

"When I met Patsy I was stationed near Washington, D.C., waiting for my discharge. One afternoon Aline telephoned and said she was coming to Washington and bringing Patsy along; I was to meet them at the station. I was annoyed and nervous. I knew Aline thought it was high time I became acquainted with some nice girl and got married. I wasn't sure I'd know how to act with a nice girl.

"The only type girls I knew were the kind who let you stay all night. In fact, my buddy, Sam, and I already had dates for the evening with a couple of that type. I telephoned them to expect us late and notified Sam he was elected to be my sister's dinner escort.

"More to please my sister than Patsy, I picked a super restaurant. My wife has a high regard for herself, but I can tell you on that particular date Patsy was a dud. She was outraged by a joke Sam told and said so. She refused me a good-night kiss after I'd spent at least thirty dollars on her. At that point I blew up and informed Patsy I was acquainted with a hundred girls who were better looking and better company than she was. I exaggerated, of course. Patsy blew up too. She called me an egotistical buffoon and wondered out loud how Aline could possibly have a brother as crude and ignorant as I was.

"I'd known a lot of women and I'd heard a lot of sweet speeches. I'd always had the feeling women were trying to take me in. Thinking about Patsy, I realized that for the first time I knew where I stood with a girl, knew what the girl really thought of me. Patsy's honesty wasn't flattering, but I found a comfort in it, after admitting to myself I probably deserved some of her harsh remarks.

"Three months later my sister wrote that Patsy planned to spend her vacation in Washington, D.C. Although I didn't hear from Patsy directly, it struck me there were other places she could have vacationed, that maybe she didn't downright hate me and it might be safe to call her. We had a fine time those two weeks. Patsy used to be fun. In those days she wasn't a nagger and out to manage my affairs in every particular.

"The same afternoon I got my discharge from the Air Corps I paid a hundred-dollar deposit on a seven-hundred-dollar diamond and took the train to Baltimore to ask Patsy to marry me. I found her whole family, none of whom I had met, celebrating her father's fiftieth birthday. Easily a hundred people were boiling in and out of the house when I pulled Patsy out into the yard and proposed. She accepted me and dashed back inside the house before I could stop her and announced our engagement to the crowd. My back was pounded black and blue by people congratulating me. Then an uncle of Patsy's, who owns a jewelry store, offered to provide us with an engagement ring at wholesale. Patsy threw her arms around her uncle and made me thank him for his generosity, while in my pocket was the ring I had bought for her.

"WHO WILL TIE YOUR SHOE?"

—Folk song.

BY ELIZABETH McFARLAND

Oh, who will tie your shoe
And smooth your pretty hair
And who will love you as I do
If I'm not there?

Who'll crisp your yellow bow,
Who'll bleach your small shirt white,
And who will temper winds that blow
Over you at night?

You need wild berries for your dish,
New milk for your bowl;
Oh, who will know your smallest wish
And make it bright and whole?

I walk with caution through the land,
Alert in all I do,
For who would warm your little hand
And who would tie your shoe?

"Next day we picked out a diamond at her uncle's store. It wasn't exactly a bargain. I returned the ring I'd bought, but I didn't get back my hundred dollars. I saw no reason to go into lengthy explanations or to start an argument. I dislike arguments. A talking woman tires me, and that's the truth. Jabber, jabber, jabber is Patsy's way. On my job I listen to people talk eight hours daily and when evening comes I'm in the mood to rest my ears.

"My family didn't chatter and spread goose grease all the time, as Patsy and her folks do. Frankly, I consider my wife's family insincere. Originally I believed my in-laws were fond of me. But I quickly got the feeling they were teaming up with her against me. I felt we needed to move far away from them, and fast.

"Patsy and I have prospered in California, but she yearns for Baltimore and runs back there every year. She prefers her blood kin to me and our son. The truth is she cares nothing for me. She left my bed on the pretext I didn't kiss her often enough. Hugging and kissing are for kids. I just can't see myself holding hands with a woman I'm married to. The mere idea makes me feel—well—uncomfortable, foolish. I never saw my father kiss my mother.

"Nor can I feature myself allowing a woman to lead me around by the nose. Patsy still complains about four suits I bought four years ago. I still wear them. The most expensive was priced at a hundred and seventy-five dollars, two of them were only sixty dollars. I like good clothes. I was twenty-five years old before I owned a regular suit of clothes. Up until then I wore blue jeans or Government-issue uniforms. I shot my wad on my first suit—it cost three hundred and fifty dollars, and to me it was worth the price. But I was a bachelor then. Bachelors don't know how well off they are.

"Patsy complains that our landscaping costs too much—as a boy picking coal I used to think of someday owning a yard full of flowering plants—and that our furniture is too scanty. If she wants fine furniture to impress the neighbors, why doesn't she buy and pay for it? She wasted enough money on my father to buy a sofa, although he never lifted a finger to help me. I had no interest in entertaining him and I don't care to get involved in entertaining the neighbors. I've been stung by so-called friends too often.

"Patsy clamors constantly for me to take her to the movies. I doubt my mother ever saw a movie in her life. She stayed home and kept house and cooked and tended her kids.

"Adopting Kyle was Patsy's idea, not mine, but his welfare now means more to me than it does to her. I'm determined our boy shall have a better break than I had. He needs and deserves two parents. For Kyle's sake, I think Patsy should behave herself, forget Baltimore and start acting like a good mother and a good wife."

The marriage counselor says:

"Patsy and Nils needed to understand each other in terms of their dissimilar backgrounds, their past experience and, for that matter, their national origins. Ordinarily, generalities cataloguing national characteristics are meaningless. But Patsy was almost a stereotype of the warmhearted, quick-tempered Irish colleen. And Nils, with his repressions and abnormal reticences, could well have been described as a 'melancholy Dane.'

"In childhood, Nils fought hard to win individual praise and attention, but was lost in the traffic jam of youngsters in the household. His spontaneous loving feelings, like his natural yearning for personal recognition, were crushed by the fierce competition offered by seven brothers and four sisters. Similarly, I suspect, the loving feelings of his overburdened parents may have been buried under the weight of financial failure and poverty.

"Except for his much older sister Aline, Nils had no special comrade, no sponsor. Intelligent and ambitious, he learned to repress rigidly his inner feelings, to keep his mouth shut about his private triumphs, disappointments, inner thoughts. He became a lone wolf, a typical dyed-in-the-wool bachelor.

"Patsy had no conception of the kind of man she was marrying. Dazzled by Nils' good looks and his intelligence, obvious despite his lack of formal education, she yielded to romantic imaginings. Unrealistically, she pictured her reserved, quiet fiancé as quickly making the necessary personality changes and assuming an important role in her gregarious, noisy, emotional family.

"Nils balked. He was accustomed to writing off generosity as a sign of weakness; undue exuberance made him uneasy; he was very likely to interpret an impulsive compliment as calculated flattery. As a general rule, he reacted to other people with mistrust. Occasionally, however, his deeply buried natural warmth would burst through and he then attempted to buy a friend by favor or with a money loan. This maneuver is common among young children who say, in effect, to another child, 'I will lend you this toy and then you will have to like me.' When Nils' friendship-buying attempts proved abortive, he decided that he and Patsy could dispense with neighborly social friendships.

"After a ten-year marriage Nils remained, essentially, a bachelor. His marriage and home were distinctly secondary with him. Long practiced in repressing affection, he was inclined to be extremely wary of affection expressed by others. Only with his small son, too young to represent a threat, was Nils able to be relaxed and warm, to be . . . himself.

"To him, marriage was designed to provide a man with a place to hang his hat, was supposed to satisfy his physical needs, but meant little else. He expected to find his comradeship and fun among other men. Nils wasn't a basically cold personality, he was merely thwarted. His work, which fascinated him, offered a fine outlet for these thwarted feelings. The sympathetic hearing he gave every prospective borrower, the key of his success, was truly representative of his nature.

"Both Patsy and Nils were interested in preserving their marriage. In only three conferences they perceived the causes of their marital conflict and both were able to effect alterations in their habits and themselves.

"Patsy wasn't entirely guiltless. She was headstrong. It wasn't very bright of her to encumber herself with her father-in-law, when she knew how her husband disliked his parent. She was endeavoring to enforce a pattern familiar and dear to her—everybody adored Patsy's father—upon people with a completely different tradition.

"To relieve her personal frustration, Patsy tried to shove around a man who resented and did not respond to feminine prodding. She allowed herself to fall into whining and nagging; she mourned the beauties of Baltimore while overlooking the beauties of California. Some of the gifts Patsy was showering on her family were too extravagant for their income, just as Nils' clothing bills were too high. Patsy and Nils have curbed their extravagance to some degree. Both are capable of commanding good salaries. Wastefulness was less a problem with them than their criticalness of each other's purchases.

"Patsy and Nils had got off to a poor start together. In their first important year of marriage, Patsy nursed on the night shift and Nils continued on his merry bachelor ways. In the evenings he coached a basketball team, went bowling with his buddies, whiled away pleasant hours at a Y.M.C.A. swimming pool. It did not occur to him that his wife was entitled to diversion, and in his company. On Patsy's free evenings he did not suggest that the two of them share some amusement. She was too proud to protest in her honeymoon days. Later, she protested too much.

"The years Nils spent almost exclusively in a masculine society had shut him off from gaining any worth-while knowledge of women. Ignorant of the nature of femininity, he was unacquainted with the ways of tenderness, and the deep joy to be found in a satisfying sexual relationship. When he recognized the reasons he had found it difficult to show his love for Patsy by small outward signs of affection, he became able to change. Admitting his wife's need for recreation and variety, he dropped some of his sessions with the boys and discovered that domesticity can be pleasant.

"For Patsy changed too. To her a good-by and a hello kiss, a warm handclasp were all-important. She returned to the double bed she had never really desired to leave. Her quarreling and nagging were silenced. As Patsy talked less, Nils talked more and discovered that conversations held with women aren't necessarily tedious. One day, sheepishly, he actually quoted Patsy to me.

"The last time I heard from Patsy and Nils was six months ago. She called to notify me they had adopted a baby girl and that Nils was as doting of little Clara as of Kyle. And then Patsy told me something that touched and amused me. In our original interview Nils brusquely said to me, 'Please don't try buttering me up. Nothing I've ever won has been worth anything.' According to Patsy, he is now a changed character indeed. Not long before, so she said, Nils went to considerable trouble to collect the scattered ribbons and decorations he had acquired in World War Two. The medals Nils was ashamed to discuss even with his wife, for fear of seeming boastful and mawkish, are now on display in the family game room, because he wants his children to be proud of their father. Both Patsy and I were pleased. We both knew that Nils now isn't ashamed to show and express his feelings. He admits he is human."

Main dishes with a Southern accent

Here are five of my most successful recipes—the family sings their praises and my guests ask for the recipes.

DI PIETRO

Cooking a gumbo is a Creole a
It can't be hurrie

"Watch your weight" has become such a credo in the Air Force that when I entertain our friends I gear my cooking to dieters. I am amused by people who come to dinner and have never had real Southern cooking. The discovery that it need not add extra calories so surprises and delights them that they want my recipes. These recipes in themselves are not really true diet food—even though they are low in fat. The secret is keeping the calories for the whole meal low, and this is done by carefully choosing foods in the rest of the menu. My pet party menu usually includes simple hors d'oeuvres served in the living room. The rest of the meal I serve buffet style—okra gumbo, a crisp green salad, French bread, relishes, a light dessert (possibly ice cream for those who can indulge) and coffee.

Okra gumbo: Buy 2 pounds of either stewing beef or veal cut into 1″ cubes. Put in a heavy kettle or Dutch oven along with 2 cups water, 2 cups chopped onion, ¾ cup chopped green pepper, ¾ cup chopped celery, 2 cloves garlic, crushed. Season with 1½ teaspoons salt, 1½ teaspoons gumbo filé, 1 teaspoon sugar, ½ teaspoon basil, ½ teaspoon orégano, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and a dash of crushed red-pepper flakes. Gumbo filé is innate to gumbo as far as Southern cooks are concerned, but it is not generally available in the North. It may be omitted, in which case add a little more red pepper and herbs. Simmer, covered, for 1 hour. Separate the meat from the broth and set both aside. Make a brown roux wit ¼ cup flour and ¼ cup bacon dri pings. Add the broth, 4 fresh tomatoe peeled and quartered, and 1 cup tomat sauce. Cover and cook until the sauce well blended. Then add the meat, cov again, and simmer gently about 4 minutes longer. Stir occasionally to pr vent sticking. Wash and trim 1 pounds fresh okra. Then cut into ½ pieces—there will be about 3 cup (You can use two 10-ounce package of frozen okra.) Add to the gumbo an cook another 20–30 minutes, or unt the okra is tender. Serve with ric Makes 6 servings.

per steak: Cut 1 flank steak into strips, crosswise (against the grain the meat). Sauté the beef strips kly in 3 tablespoons very hot bacon pings until lightly browned. Re- ve from the pan and discard the pings. To the same pan add 1 cup er and 3 peeled and quartered h tomatoes. Season with ¼ cup soy ce, ¼ teaspoon sugar and a dash pepper. Thicken with 1 tablespoon nstarch which has been blended h ¼ cup cold water until smooth. mmer, covered, for about 10 min- s, or until the tomatoes are tender the flavors are blended. Add 1 cup rsely cut green peppers. Cook just il they lose their crispness. Add the wned meat and heat only a minute two. Longer cooking would make beef tough. Serve immediately with e. Makes 6 servings.

wn South we stuff our chickens for sting with a well-seasoned corn- ad stuffing instead of regular bread. eat corn bread at practically every al, so it's always on hand. Chappie s this dish is "the most."

Roast capon with corn-bread stuffing: Mix 2 cups unsweetened corn-bread crumbs with ½ cup diced celery, ¼ cup melted butter or margarine, 2 tablespoons chopped onion, ¼ teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon poultry seasoning and a dash of pepper. (We don't add sugar to corn bread in the South, so if sugar is included in your pet recipe, omit it for this stuffing. Sweetened corn-bread crumbs just wouldn't make a good stuffing.) Beat 1 egg slightly and add to the crumbs, mixing lightly with a fork. Add ½ cup coarsely chopped well-drained oysters. Rub the cavity of a 4–5-pound capon with salt and pepper. Stuff and truss. Roast, uncovered, in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1¼ hours, or until the bird is tender. Makes 6 servings. We don't serve gravy, but it is easily made from the drippings.

We Southerners have our special ways with crab meat. Mine is a fluffy crab soufflé—made savory with a little cheese and a whisper of nutmeg.

Crab soufflé: Make a cheese sauce by melting ¼ cup butter or margarine in the top of a double boiler. Stir in 3 tablespoons flour, then 1 cup milk, and continue cooking until the sauce is thickened. Beat 3 egg yolks slightly. Gradually add the hot sauce to them. Return to double boiler. Continue cooking until the sauce is thickened again. Add ¼ cup grated sharp Cheddar cheese along with 1 teaspoon salt, a dash of nutmeg and one of cayenne. Heat only until the cheese is melted. Remove from the heat and add ¾ cup well-boned shredded Japanese canned crab meat. Gently fold the hot mixture into 3 stiffly beaten egg whites, a little at a time. Pour into a well-greased 1-quart casserole and set in a pan of hot water. Bake in a hot oven, 450° F., for 20–25 minutes. Serve at once. Makes 6 servings. END cars he leaned back, clapped her on the thigh and said, "You feel good."

THE DECEPTION

She blushed.

"You look good too," he said. "Is that the new coat?"

"I suppose I was extravagant," she said. "I really needed it for my job, Nick. I wonder how some of the other women manage."

"Maybe they're not paying off any houses," he told her.

"But you're glad about the house. You wouldn't call that an extravagance, would you, even though it is too big for us?"

"No more extravagant than the boat, or the dues at the yacht club," he said. "There are two of us working. And what do we have to save our money for?"

That was the first stab; she felt it only slightly, forgot it almost at once.

Otherwise, everything was as she'd hoped. It didn't snow until after dinner, the house was extravagantly bright and warm, and Hilda always cooked as if for a prodigal unless expressly restrained. They carried their coffee into the living room, and Nick touched a match to the fire that had been laid and they stretched out in front of it.

"Too bad we don't come out more often in the winter," he said.

"Wait until we retire," she said.

"You'll never retire," he said. "You'll be sitting in Bud Fiske's chair before that."

"And what would I do if I retired? Play canasta, attend afternoon meetings?"

He was silent, and she wondered if he were keeping back an answer, if she had been too belligerent. She sat up and poured herself some more coffee. The telephone rang; Hilda answered it, her steps approached the living room.

"Mrs. Porter wants to speak to either one of you," Hilda said.

"I'll get it," Kate said and went to the phone. "Hi, Joan," she said. "Happy New Year."

"That's what I called about," Joan Porter said. "We saw your lights, and suspected you had come home to Eastport for a change. If you're not doing anything more exciting, would you like to join us? The Greggs will be over later too."

She hesitated. "I'll ask Nick."

She paused in the living-room doorway, watching him lying on his back, his head turned toward the fire; she said tentatively, "Care to drop in at the Porters and say Happy New Year?"

He sat up at once. "Why not?"

She felt unreasonably bothered by his alacrity.

The snow was coming down thickly and quietly when they went out, Nick carrying a bottle of champagne for the Porters. In the few hundred yards between their houses their coats were furred with snow. They stood on the porch to take off their overshoes, to shake their coats. Had he been too anxious to come to the Porters', had it been too quiet and too lonely in their big house on a holiday night, a quietness and loneliness they had no time for in their tiny Manhattan apartment?

The Porters had turned out the living-room lights so that they all sat within the bright, warm radius of the fireplace. She heard Nick's voice "—— never get to spend a quiet New Year like this, away from New York. It's quite a change." Was that what had happened, did their busy life insulate them from thought, from the realization that there were just the two of them? Was that what had confronted them tonight, making Nick leave gladly his pleasant fire in his own pleasant house for people they barely knew?

Sam Porter was saying, "—— about as much excitement as we allow ourselves, with baby-sitting costing what it does, and living all the way out here."

"That reminds me," Joan said suddenly. "Sam, you promised Mark you'd wake him up at midnight."

"I didn't forget," her husband said, looking at his watch. "You get the glasses and the champagne. I'll get Mark."

He came down the steps in a few minutes carrying his three-year-old son high on his shoulder. Mark's face was reddened with sleep, his bathrobe was bunched up around his middle because Sam had put it on in haste. Sam put him down in front of the fire and then left to help his wife with the tray. He had wrapped the neck of the bottle professionally with a napkin, and now he made a show of turning the corkscrew.

"Now hear this," he said, grinning at his son watching him. "This is one of the characteristic sounds of the New Year." He pulled out the cork with a satisfactory pop, and began to fill the glasses.

"How about that?" Nick said in a low voice to Mark. Mark came over to him and peered into the glass that he held; he blinked at the hissing bubbles. "Can he have a taste?" Nick asked Joan.

"Just let him wet his lips," she said.

Bells rang out suddenly, in the distance, from the town. A fire siren blew, and then another, from another direction, both far enough away not to be unpleasant.

"Happy New Year," Nick said gravely to Mark. "Have a drink."

Sam was kissing his wife, the Greggs were kissing. Nick leaned over to kiss Kate heartily on the mouth. "And many others," she whispered.

Nick picked up Mark and carried him over to the window. He pulled up the blind, and she heard him say, "It's snowing, which makes it a perfect New Year. Look at that. Isn't that something!"

The sirens started from another village. "It's a fire," Mark cried, listening rigidly. "That's the fire siren!"

"Not tonight," Nick answered. "Tonight it means this is the very beginning of a new year, the very first minutes of it."

She sipped her champagne, feeling lonely even here.

The bells rang a while longer, the fire sirens finally died away in a last mournful blast, there were only a single glass and part of a second all around in the bottle, and both the Porters and the Greggs had small children and would be up early tomorrow, so in a little while they all said good night.

Nick and Kate walked back in the snow to their house. They stood outside a few minutes without speaking; then he said, "What's the matter, Kate?"

She took a breath. "Nothing."

"Come on."

"I was thinking," she said. "Nothing monumental or original, only that holidays are a time for children."

He made a noncommittal sound.

"Don't you feel that way? It's different other times of the year. You hardly have a chance to think of them," she said, staring up into his face.

His face was noncommittal too.

"Didn't you envy the Porters tonight?" she said tightly. "Didn't our house seem . . . purposeless?"

He put his arm around her and walked her into the house. She waited for his answer while they hung up their wet coats, while he broke up the last embers in the fireplace. "Aren't you going to answer me?" she said, her voice a little high.

"I don't envy any man," he said, and took her in his arms.

That eased her for a while; then she broke away. "Are you being completely honest?"

"Wouldn't know how," he said.

"Nick! I mean it!"

"Mean what?"

"Maybe we ought to adopt a baby."

He said a little wearily, "Is this the time to talk about it?"

"By tomorrow I might forget."

"Forget what?"

She said in a low voice, "The way you looked with Mark."

He sat down and pulled her onto his knee; his face was abstracted, as if he were thinking of something else. Suddenly as she looked at him all her vague feelings of doubt, all the little stabs of the day, coalesced and became clear and significant. He hadn't wanted to tell her; he had been afraid he might hurt her and so he had just kept it to himself. She whispered, "I've been such a fool, not to have guessed it before. Such a fool!"

"Listen to me, Kate," he said. "Of course I wanted children. I didn't have to come right out and tell you, did I? But we had that bad luck, and we couldn't have them, and we've learned to live without them."

"Have we?"

"Have you?"

"It's different for me," she said instantly.

"Why?"

"I had to face the fact five years ago. I had to realize I couldn't have a baby, and I had to do something about it fast, or I couldn't bear it. And luckily I could go back to a good job, one that didn't leave any time to think about children, let alone need them. It's not the same thing at all for you."

"Look," he said, "I don't want you adopting any children for my sake, because you think I need them. I don't need them any more than you do. Let's go to bed, Kate. I spent most of last night in the plane's lounge, and I'm bushed. That's my last word on the subject for tonight."

What was wrong about adopting a child for your husband's sake? she thought later as she lay awake. You did many things for each other because you loved each other. She flung herself to one side, restless. Everything had subtly changed. She was not the same Kate who had blithely readied the house for Nick's return;

"Why didn't you tell me you had all these smart clothes stuck away in that old trunk!"

there was a crack in the smooth finish of th lives, she felt unsure, she felt disturbed, s was hurt, she wanted to cry. Since I've depriv him of children of his own, the very least I c do is adopt one.

She flung herself to the other side, and stirred, and muttered, "Go to sleep."

"Nick, I'm writing a letter to the agency the morning."

"Go to sleep, sweetheart," he muttered.

She did write a letter to the agency in t morning, defiantly, reddening when he ca in from outside and read it over her should

He said, "Are you really going through wi this?"

"I've been stupid, and selfish. I want make it up to you."

"Kate, you have nothing to make up to me he said violently. "Are you going to thro over a satisfactory arrangement just becau I showed the Porter kid what snow look like on New Year's Eve?"

"Yes," she said.

"I resent it," he said. "I don't want y making any sacrifices for me." He walked o throwing the last words over his shoulder.

She ran after him and made him stop. "W should you resent it? Can't I do what I kn will make you happy?"

"Not in this case. There's a child's happ ness involved. If you take a decisive step li this you have to want to. Otherwise, co sciously or unconsciously, every time an thing goes wrong, or you're upset, or d appointed, you're going to blame that chi What kind of favor do you do a kid with th attitude?" He disengaged her arm and we on outside.

She stared after him for a while, and th she slowly went back to the desk and rere her letter. "We can't have children of our ow and since we long so much to have a chil can you help us?" She thought, If I had writt this letter five years ago it would have been t truth. But after the miscarriage, after I realiz there was nothing I or anyone else could about it, I had to make myself learn not to lo for a baby. And I did learn. The job helped, a I gave it everything I had, and I was good at and they pushed me up fast so that now it's goo and rewarding work. I love Nick, I love o life, I've made my adjustments. I'm thirty-fou I'm not sure but that I'm too old to chan again. I don't "long" any more to have a bab but I want to give Nick what he wants. If I we ever to say that in my letter —— She stared it a little grimly. Smack into an agency wast basket is where that kind of letter would lan. She signed the letter swiftly, sealed and a dressed it.

There was no reply for a month. And the a letter came, signed by an Edith Brand; said that the agency had received their lett and would file their request as of the date ser but that there were so many applications th no definite appointment could be made f them at this time.

She showed the letter to Nick. He said, "I sure you can wait."

As a matter of fact, she could. They we winding up their spring season and Marc Avante himself was expected over from Par to give the line an added fillip of publicity, an she was late for dinner nearly every night an there was no time even to have her hair do and she was grateful for Sunday when sh could relax in the apartment and she didn even want to drive out to Eastport. She pra tically never thought about the agency. Wh would Bud Fiske, who was head of the Ne York house of Marcel Avante, think if h even suspected she was considering a baby His tower of strength, his dynamo of energ his righthand man—why, she'd be too terrifie even to tell him! He would split with laught before he withered her with reproach!

In the middle of February another lett came fixing an appointment. She thrust into her handbag and called Nick.

As casually as she could, she said, "Wha are you doing on Wednesday at ten-thirty i the morning?"

They left the office in silence and walked to the restaurant where they usually lunched together. Her head was throbbing.

He grinned at her, but tiredly. "Sorry you got started?"

"I didn't expect to meet up with that kind of gal," she said. "But I suppose they have to be tough, turning so many people away."

He said, "She seemed like ... competent girl. She's anxious to do a good job."

"Too anxious."

"As she says, they need some basis to do their weeding out. Why do we feel this way, Kate? Let her find out whatever she can about us. If we put anything over on her, and we really wouldn't make good parents, then we're the ones that will get stuck, as well as the kid. I don't imagine it will be a blow one way or the other."

"You know you'd be miserable if she turned us down."

"Not the way you feel about this whole thing. And get this, Kate: I'm perfectly happy to go on as we have. I don't know why, married to an unreasonable female like you."

The second appointment came three weeks later. This time it was for Kate alone, and she was more nervous than before. She entered Mrs. Brand's office and made a great show of removing her gloves as she seated herself.

"Won't you take off your coat?" Mrs. Brand said. "Make yourself comfortable."

"It's all right," she said, opening another button. She was irritated at her own nervousness; she met many important people in her job, and here she was as timid and self-conscious as a schoolgirl.

"Now let's find out all about you," Mrs. Brand said, leaning back in her chair. "What kind of person are you? What do you like to do best? Did you have a happy childhood? What kind of home was it?"

She was sure of herself on this ground at least, and talked freely. She told about growing up in a family of four children, and how her father and mother had loved each other, and how bad she had felt when she and Nick knew they couldn't have a family of their own. But they had succeeded in building a fine and rich life together; she told about her work, their crowded weekends, with friends, with gardening, with painting the boat and sailing it down the Sound ——

She stopped. Mrs. Brand said irrelevantly, "Tell me, do you ever feel inadequate, because you've been unable to have a child?"

"Inadequate?" Her cheeks flamed. "That's rather strong. I had an unavoidable accident. Should that make me feel inadequate?"

"Of course not. But women sometimes do feel it. You seem so insistent on proving to me how happy you are. If you are hiding a feeling of inadequacy, if you are trying to prove to yourself that you don't need a child, the child would sense this in you. He would feel not needed, maybe even not wanted."

"But he is wanted," Kate told her. "Would we be here if we didn't want him? If you ever saw my husband with children you wouldn't have any doubt about that, it would be so very clear."

"We're not talking about your husband now, Mrs. Parry. What about you?"

She felt her cheeks grow warm. "I feel the same way. Why should you even ask? Isn't it natural that I should want one?"

"Quite natural." Mrs. Brand leaned back and looked at her watch. "That's all we'll have time for today. I'll want to see your husband alone too. Do you think he could come—let's see, a week from Thursday?"

"I'm sure he can," Kate said. "My husband will be going abroad on business in April. Is there a chance we'll know something definite by then?"

"I honestly don't know," Mrs. Brand said.

Cold fish, Kate thought resentfully, hailing a taxi to meet Nick at Emilio's.

"How did it go?" he asked her.

The Number 1 Cleaner exclusively for glass

She sank down on the seat without meeting his eyes. "I think she's a sadist," she said bitterly. "She won't be satisfied until I break down and tell her I'm completely miserable over our childlessness. She can't believe I could be childless and still be happy."

"You may be right," he said. "She could understand you better."

"But I am happy. At least I was before we got involved in this. She almost caught me today, when I told her how much you wanted the baby."

"Almost caught you?" he said ironically.

His own interview came and went, and he was vague about it. "Same stuff," he said. They were both keyed up by now, and restless, and on the next weekend they decided to drive out to Eastport for the day.

The ground was still frozen, the evergreens looked rusty, the house was cold and bleak when they opened the front door. They walked through quickly, opening blinds to let in the cold March sunlight, turning up the thermostat so that very soon there was the cheerful smell of heat in each room. It seemed to her that she was seeing the house for the first time; she studied the furnishings carefully, sturdy old furniture, good, worn rugs, lots of natural-wood paneling, nothing that a baby could spoil. We'll live here, of course, we won't be able to afford two rentals. I wouldn't mind too much, a winter here might be interesting, I could manage without a steady maid, just someone once a week maybe for heavy cleaning ——

"What are you plotting?" Nick said, startling her, coming up from the cellar where he had been oiling the circulator.

She smiled at him, because he looked different when he was out at Eastport, younger, more relaxed, not recognizably the competent businessman at home on two continents, not with his hands always stained with something, oil, or grease, or earth, not in those disreputable clothes. "I suppose we'll live out here when the baby comes."

"Will you mind? So far from New York?"

"New York won't be as accessible, anyway, once we have the baby. What about you, commuting all year?"

"Sam Porter does it, so do others. I'm thinking about when I have to leave for Marseille."

"I might just pick up the baby and come with you," she said.

"Think I'd mind?" He squeezed her against him. "Is this the room you've picked out for the baby?"

It was. It was a small, cheerful room facing south and near their own room. "There's place for a crib along that wall, if we move out the desk. We can move it back later when he outgrows the crib, and he can use the desk for schoolwork." When he began to grin, she said defensively, "I'm just thinking ahead," but she laughed at herself with him.

After he went downstairs she rolled up the thin Persian rug and carried it into the guest room; she brought back the bright braided rug from the guest-room floor. That's better, she thought. I'll get some organdy for the windows, those drapes shut out too much sun. Nick was whistling for her. She went to the window and looked down. He motioned for her to come out, so she took her coat and j him.

"Look," he said.

The forsythia was opening up in the tered southern corner of the house, an bed of daffodils that he had planted bene was showing yellow. With sudden intensi said, "I love this house."

"Will you still feel that way when you be able to run back to a tidy little apart in New York?"

She didn't answer.

PARLOR TRAVELS

By KAE WUEBKER

Today we picked flowers in spite of the snow;
How we could pick flowers is more than I know.
But Nancy picked lilies, and Lee picked a rose.
The subzero weather was the least of our woes:
I picked windflowers, and made a bouquet.
Then the Queen called, so we asked her to stay:
We had crackers and milk—it was good as could be
And the Queen said, "I surely prefer this to tea."
We went for a sleigh ride, and gathered the eggs,
And watered the colt with long, spindly legs.
Then Queen said she must go, and she'd had a good time,
And I said we must go, because it was nine.
We laughed as I opened the bedroom door
Because, in our parlor, as we sit on the floor,
We can walk in the sun while rain pours from the sky,
And love one another, my children and I.

. Brand looked from Nick to Kate. I wrong?"

She could hardly speak, her throat was so full.

"Was I wrong?" Mrs. Brand said again, gently. "I want to help you. Tell me if I was wrong."

"You were wrong," she said tightly. "I was sure you would see how I really felt. I thought you were trained to understand."

"You wanted me to see behind that screen of defenses you had made, and tell you what you couldn't bring yourself to tell me. I was to understand that you were hurt once, that you were afraid to be hurt again, and so you built up this elaborate structure of not wanting the child, of going through with it only for your husband's sake. Mrs. Parry, I'm no psychologist. I'm only a social worker."

"But then you did know! You understood all the while!"

"I only suspected," Mrs. Brand said. "And even if I was sure, what good would that do? You had to know it, you had to face up to the truth. As you have. My letter helped, didn't it?" she said.

Kate nodded slowly.

"It wasn't a trick," Mrs. Brand said. "Maybe I hoped it would make you see, and bring you here. But otherwise it would have had to stand."

Kate met her eyes. The inquisitor who had sat behind the desk was gone, the inquisitor who had tried brutally to break her down and expose her; instead there was a girl with a troubled face, whose hair was mussed as if she had pulled off her hat in a hurry, whose middle finger had an ink smudge on it, whose eyes looked worried and anxious not to make a mistake. The girl said, "I've been very worried about you. You both have so much to give a child. I've been so afraid we were going to lose you."

Kate sank back in her chair. She wanted to look at Nick, but she couldn't. Not just yet. She was still too strange to herself, and too vulnerable. She was revealed, so she was shy.

Mrs. Brand said, "Now we can really begin to work with you."

e world is heavy with burdens. I some- think much of my life has been waving off to war or packing boxes to send to front. Perhaps it is inevitable, perhaps ll never know a world at peace.

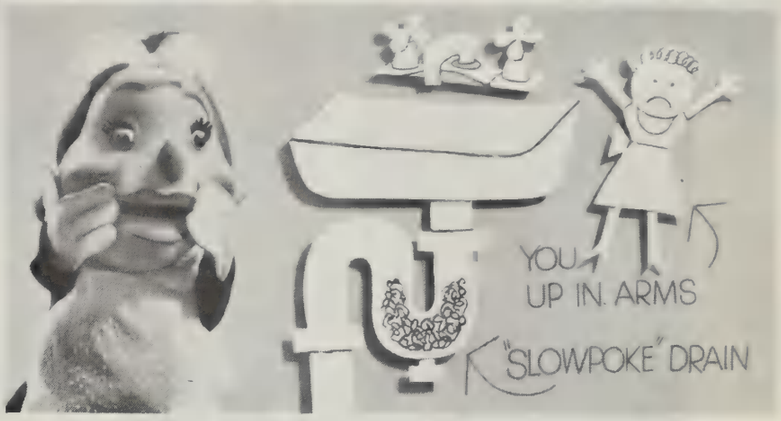
Most of us have not yet got used to the atom bomb. We now must assimilate the power of the hydrogen bomb, which makes the atom bomb seem a toy.

But in the country, we have faith. Winter follows autumn, and spring comes at her appointed time. Man has not yet put out the moon. We plant a bulb in the autumn and a golden tulip blooms in spring, just as it should.

We feel the kindness of neighbors when we are in trouble, and we cannot help believing the world is just a bigger neighborhood. The people in the world all, I believe, want the same things. They want to work in peace, to have homes and families and gardens. They want to worship God in their own way, and they want their children to be educated.

The vast economic struggles of world powers could surely be settled. There is, actually, enough for everybody. And as Madame Chaillot said, "There is nothing wrong with the world that a sensible woman could not settle in an afternoon."

Today being Sunday, the church bell rings in the village. Our little white church has stood as a tribute to faith since the French troops marched by during the Revolution, their white plumes flashing in the sunlight. The wars we have lived through have not closed the wide doors of this church. And we still sing, "Praise God from Whom all blessings flow," as our forefathers did.



Our young minister may preach on the text "Love thy neighbor as thyself." We could run a pretty good world on that text, I think.

The applewood fire burns brightly on the old hearth at dusk. Savory pot roast cooks over it, in the old iron kettle. Holly keeps watch.

And so I go to the door and look out at the violet shadows on the snow, and send my thoughts out into the gathering dark.

Some of the worst overgrown evergreen trees in the foundation planting were done away with, but worth-while ones that could still be handled were moved forward where they now protect the patio from the street, aided and abetted by a few new additions in suitable varieties.

STOLLER

Out from Behind those Bushes

We leave it to you or any other qualified appraiser, how much more this home is worth now than it was before the transformation

By RICHARD PRATT
Architectural and Garden Editor of the Journal

The transformation cost $243.50 for the materials and about $200 worth of work. Any able-bodied owner working along with experienced help could cut the labor cost considerably. And countless homes can benefit from this experience.

The faults of front-yard and foundation planting constitute the commonest appearance problem of most American houses. Ill-advised evergreens set against the house to mask the foundations can end by masking the whole house itself. That was happening here.

We moved the still-movable trees forward where they should have been planted in the first place. Here they provide privacy for a front-yard patio that intrigues the passer-by, welcomes the visitor, and delights the owner with his little piece of intimate landscape. In doing so we did away with a concrete path that marched up the middle of a bare front lawn, then laid steps down beside the drive instead.

Against the high foundations, now unmasked, we built a planting bed with a low wall of cement blocks. We also built the low block wall you see to level up the patio that we further framed with low fencing. Cascading petunias follow spring bulbs in the house beds, and other annuals touch up the patio interior. New permanent plants and paving slabs were two major items of cost, as the accounting indicates.

The appearance problems of front-yard and foundation plantings differ, of course, from house to house. But the underlying principles implicit here in the picture and plan apply to endless similar situations everywhere. Just see how well they fit your own.

WHAT IS THE BEST TIME FOR TOILET TRAINING?

functions, his rights and possessions. He realizes his bowel movements are his and takes pride in them. This may cause him to take a more positive interest in toileting or it may cause him to turn against it. It will depend on how touchy he is about his independence, and how much he likes to please his mother. The latter in turn depends in part on how tactful she is in winning his co-operation.

In the second half of the second year he becomes still more aware of when a movement is coming. Also, he seems to have a feeling now that the movement is not so much a prized production as it is something to be shed. Many children at this stage begin to feel uncomfortable when soiled and some act a little disgusted with the smell. It is probably this combination of the child's awareness, his more negative attitude toward his movement and the parents' interest (when expressed) which makes so many children begin to use the family word or a grunt or some other signal. A few come to training at this age primarily through imitation.

Even after a child has shown his positive interest in using the seat, there still remains the subsequent stage when he doesn't depend on his mother any more but slips down his own clothes and climbs on the seat himself.

The second general principle that I think is important for parents to understand is that it's good for a child to become trained through a feeling that he himself wants to grow up and master this business himself—even if the suggestion comes from the parent and even if he does it partly to please her—rather than to be forced or shamed into it. Just as forcible training harms a child's attitude, so we realize that training of which he is proud strengthens his personality. It can build his self-confidence, increase his co-operation and generosity, give him more trust in parents and other people who ask for his compliance.

When a parent who is quite casual asks me about bowel training, I say that there is no one best method because so much depends on each child's attitude at different stages, and on the parent's feelings too. But, other things being equal, the time that seems most natural to me is when a child shows readiness in the form of signals, or discomfort on soiling, or wanting to imitate another child. These signs occur most commonly somewhere between eighteen and twenty-four months, but they sometimes come earlier. But if the child shows no interest by about twenty-one months, I'd begin suggesting to him occasionally how much more grown up, comfortable and clean he will be someday when he uses a seat like the rest of us. Even before twenty-one months I might occasionally put him in training pants—or none at all—at the most likely time of day so that he'd have more chance to realize what was happening. I'd also get him a potty chair and let him become familiar and friendly with it before I ever led him to it.

Why not leave alone the child who shows no interest throughout the second year, since he will surely become trained someday? I think some pediatricians are quite willing, provided they keep in touch with the mother and give her the guidance she may need. The objection comes mainly from the child psychiatrists who see those particular children who have become emotionally disturbed by the time they reach three or four years of age without being trained. In some of these cases the parents have been trying vigorously to train, but the child has resisted just as strenuously. In others, the parents have tried to refrain, for fear of the ill effects of a battle. But the interesting thing is that these upset children ar apt to feel guilty and anxious and inadequate whether or not the parents have made an ope issue about training. It looks as if they kno in their bones that they ought to be mor grown up and know that their parents are re sentful even when they try to conceal it. I'm not saying for a minute that all children be come upset if they are not trained by two and a half or three. But since some of them do, think it is preferable for a parent to use sug gestion and encouragement by one and three quarters or two years.

And what about beginning bowel training before eighteen months? I think it's the right approach for a parent who would like to get started early. It's sensible to begin after a baby learns to sit, provided his movement is regular enough so that he can be caught each day in a few minutes, and as long as she realizes that this is only catching and familiarizing. His conscious co-operation and his taking of responsibility will depend on how he feels during the second year. There's no point trying to start before a year if he's not regular.

In the past I've assumed it was better to begin back at seven or eight months than at twelve, so that the baby will get thoroughly used to the seat before he comes to the possibly balky age. But I don't know of any statistics that would prove this point for sure. Certainly some of those accustomed to the seat from seven or eight months will rebel after a year anyway, and of course some of those started at about a year will not rebel at all, especially the compliant types. So I am not sure it makes a lot of difference. I'd leave it to the mother to decide, on the basis of what seemed right for that particular child.

Although he cannot answer letters personally, Dr. Spock will be glad to hear from readers and will discuss in these pages problems of general interest.—Ed.

REPORT ON RUSSIAN YOUTH

this three times he will, in all probability, be sent out beyond the 100-kilometer line [away from the city] and not permitted to return for years. They seemed to consider this a very severe penalty and spoke about the whole business with deep bitterness.

An official at Moscow University told me positively that one half of the students enrolled are girls and that there is a similar ratio in every Soviet university. He said that this year only five or six students have majored in American history.

In one of the libraries at the university I discovered a file of every issue of The Journal of Space Flight with the Rocket News Letter published by the Chicago Rocket Society. It was catalogued and apparently easily available.

Tonight on Gorky Street I watched a good deal of bartering for sex going on with young girls quite openly but in the darker sections of the street. I was told there are no actual brothels, but all kinds of arrangements are made on the street to keep this flourishing business going.

Lunched at a workers' café near Pushkinskaya Ul and talked with several workmen on their lunch hour, all drinking beer and eating sosiski (boiled frankfurters)—12 rubles for a bottle of beer and one order of sosiski. [Officially four rubles equal one dollar; actually it is closer to ten.] They were all rather young and non-Party. They wanted to know about American propaganda balloons, the Berlin tunnel, and U.S. planes over the Soviet bloc. One, defending the regime, said that he is a "simple worker" but he owns all the land in Russia and all the buildings, including the Kremlin. However, he faltered when I asked why he had to pay to get into the Kremlin and can only visit it at certain times.

At this point the others chimed in and accused him of being unfair to America and said they know that Soviet newspapers do not treat the West fairly. The expression was, "Our papers don't tell the whole story."

In the evening another marathon stroll along the fairly dark streets with the same group plus one fellow's girl friend. One of the boys lives with his father and mother in a single room 15 feet by 15. They share the kitchen and toilet with other tenants. Another lives with three other members of his family in one room about 9 by 11. The third boy, whose father has an important position, lives with his father and mother in a four-room apartment which they have entirely to themselves; this is the best setup I've heard of in the Soviet Union.

The man who loves only himself cannot be accused of promiscuity in his affections, but he is bound in the end to suffer intolerable boredom from the invariable sameness of the object of his devotion.

They told me that there is almost no informing on members of one's own family now, but there is a good deal in apartment houses between families. They said the sentence for speaking in public against a top leader today is twenty-five years' imprisonment following a closed trial.

When I asked what, if anything, they liked about their life they answered, "Well—the Motherland, of course." They all said, however, that, if it were possible, they would leave for the West in a minute.

In the course of our stroll we came upon a drunk, passed out on his back with a book on his stomach. We helped him up and then got into a discussion of reasons for drinking and the tradition that Russians are credited with being such heavy drinkers. I had to agree that I couldn't blame people for drinking heavily in this country, though the boys did not seem satisfied that I had any real conception of how necessary it is for many Russians to escape into vodka as often as possible.

What has impressed them most about our world is freedom. They said this in so many ways and with such deep sincerity that I was convinced they have spent much of their adult lives thinking about what I'm afraid I have always pretty much taken for granted.

Spent two and a half hours at the Lenin Library trying to find current periodicals from the United States which are nontechnical and available to the public. In spite of the usual official runaround, I went through every relevant catalogue in the building. The only significant listing was Life magazine up to 1942. There was no record of any current American periodicals except technical publications.

Then I went to the library of the Institute of Foreign Languages. In a small room there the following were on display: New York Times Magazine of April 15, 1956; National Geographic of February, 1956; and The Saturday Evening Post of May 5, 1956. The list of magazines from the United States in the catalogue included all the popular and semipopular ones, and check marks indicated that they are received regularly. I saw people reading Collier's, Life and the New York Times. All were dog-eared, as the woman in charge pointed out. Despite the official story, this library is almost certainly reserved for special students.

The most popular radio program in Moscow and Leningrad and probably throughout European Russia is Voice of America's two hours of jazz from Tangiers. On this program hen I asked one of the girls why a group had to stroll instead of standing to talk, said that to stand is "nekrasivo" (im- er). Later a young w told me that it is wise to stand for than five minutes e center of Moscow, ough it is not so im- ant if you stand le.

his conversation ed a bit awkward tense for a late gath- —probably due to insisting that we and not stroll. The p obviously does make a practice of ding on corners so the Kremlin. (We at the intersection iorky and Mokha- .) Another proba- reason: they said I am the first for- er they had ever d with.

oday I met three stil- on the street. Stil- are the zoot-suiters Russia—kids with -to-do parents, some Party officials, who to copy everything tern. The Komsom- are waging a strug- against stilyagi as as against hooligan- and drunkenness in age group. (The er age for Kom- ol membership var- but a good worker be taken in at fifteen—some even told me welve. The top age is twenty-six.)

hese stilyagi came up beside me and ed abreast of me for a minute or two. n one asked in English, "Are you for- ?"

ne of the boys is the son of an impor- medical professor. The father of another n engineer. They said that they believe ing they read in the Soviet press, for s rely only on Western radio. They named he stations and proudly told me the wave ths on which they hear Voice of America. ough jamming is complete during the day, told me it is not always so effective at t.

this group, as in many others, the one took the lead in the conversation was the who knew most about the West. They to buy everything I was wearing and d if any of my American friends here ted to sell things. I believe they were all ut twenty-one years old.

he average Soviet young person I have is no closer to his family than American th are, but he has a small number of very e friends to whom he is attached. The s of the group is "We trust one another nst 'oni'" ("them"—the Party or secret ce). They welcome the recent relaxation in r own lives and the increase in contacts veen East and West, although serious ng people feel it is not to be permanent. They are taking as much advantage of the eased atmosphere as they can.

For the stilyagi this means direct approaches to foreigners. For others it may mean applying for a tourist visa to Eastern Europe, skipping a Komsomol meeting or ignoring a militiaman's whistle on the street. I have met few boisterous kids and not one who could be considered mean. Not many are well informed about Soviet history and almost all scoff at the Marxist-Leninist theory they have been forced to learn. None claim to want a capitalistic system in Russia, but they would all like the accouterments.

Conversation on a park bench with three boys and a young girl they knew. Major subject: youthful social habits. They said that there is very little "going steady" among the kids they know, although at times affairs do last for a while, exclusive of other entanglements.

All agreed that the "prudish" ideas of Soviet morality are "idiotic" but said that, because of their upbringing, it is hard to be avant-garde. The usual date involves several hours of strolling, even in the wintertime, and most often in groups of two or three couples. If one of the group has a room in which there is music—radio or, even better, a tape recorder—the evening becomes a party with several couples making love in the same room. Usually only one couple stays all night.

When I asked if this was not actually the description of an unusual night they said, "Look, it happens all the time. You've got to understand—this is our life."

A student who has finished one year at an engineering institute told me that U. S. cigarettes sell for at least fifteen rubles on the black market in Leningrad and chewing gum for more. He said there are many fences who buy and sell such things. Stupid tourists, he told me, will sell things for far less than they're worth. Then the fences resell and make the purchase price ten times over. United States dollars were bringing as high as twenty-five rubles to the dollar in Leningrad (the official rate is four) although this varies "like the weather." American phonograph records are selling for from 100 to 200 rubles for 78's and 400 rubles (half the average monthly earnings) for LP's.

After a visit to the Novy Davichi monastery to photograph the grave of Stalin's wife I met four friends and went with them to the Sovietskaya Hotel, where we had an assortment of "cocktails" at the bar.

This group estimated that the current number of inmates in prison camps is between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000.

One fellow said this is much too low, as it does not include all those who went "dobrovolno prinuditelno" (voluntarily by compulsion) to the virgin lands, or in brigades to the east to work in the harvests.

Since then I have used this Russian expression for "voluntarily by compulsion" several times. Usually people laugh and I have been complimented on my understanding of the Soviet system. One Russian said to me, "There, you must understand, is the story of our entire life."

Sunday morning I went to Nicolskaya Tserkov, where perhaps 2000 people crowded the church. The weekly religious service was being held upstairs while downstairs, on one side of the entrance, a funeral was in progress. On the other side I saw thirty or more young mothers holding their babies in their arms and waiting to have them baptized. The priest completely immerses the baby in a tub of water. Attendants then rub the howling child briskly with towels and the next infant is popped in. Despite the screaming, candles and chanting lend a very solemn tone to the ceremony. An old woman spoke to me and said that this happens four times every Sunday and on weekdays too. Usually, she said, there are more babies than I saw today.

Spent a long evening with three young Russians and one other American in a room ten by twelve in which one of the Russians lives. This room was furnished with a bed, desk, two chairs, wardrobe, radio, phonograph and tape recorder. We drank wine and vodka with sausages and listened to jazz taped from the Voice of America. Then we heard the VOA jazz program, followed by five minutes of news in English.

Voice of America came in loud and clear. These boys say there is a big difference between VOA in English and in Russian. The English is objective; the Russian is not. One of the group who speaks English translated the news for his friends. They said that in almost every group of students there is someone who knows enough English to be able to translate for the others listening.

At night it is possible to hear the VOA broadcasts in Russian—as I discovered myself—but because of the jamming it was difficult to understand complete sentences. Sometimes it is quite easy, I was told. Weather conditions make the difference. Broadcasts of music are not jammed. One fellow who knows a lot about the technical side of radio told n that for each district in Leningrad there is separate jamming station. The best time listen varies from city to city. Everyone agre that listening is better in the country.

The Hotel Odessa (in that city) overloo the port, and across the street is a narrow pa with benches and flowers where the entire ci seems to stroll in the evening. Tonight in brief stroll I saw many sailors, some of the with girls who were being mauled a bit, sittir on park benches. There were groups who we singing and even a few sailors whistling, b most of the people talked quietly. Entire fam lies sat silent on benches, often with ve small babies—and this was at about 11 P.M.

The black market in Odessa—the famo "Tolkuchka"—is a large, square enclosu with many stalls and hu mobs of people millir around on Sunday, fewer weekdays. It is a thirty-mi ute bus ride from the city a anyone in Odessa will t you how to get there. T saying is that "At Tolkuch they will buy and sell ever thing except the atom bomb. For that you mu wait a few days."

They wanted all the details I could them on our wide-screen movies. Only they talked about America or how im- nt it is to have a short-wave radio did really warm up. n my last day in Moscow I saw men and nen lined up in several places to buy fresh ad. In a bookstore on Kusnetsky Most re were perhaps 150 students fighting to get mited supply of pamphlet texts on chem- y and physics.

The Russian people are extremely curious ut everything American, and the Russian- aking tourist has no trouble in finding ndly people to talk with. One easy way to in a conversation is to say, "Excuse me. uld you tell me where American books are d here?" I also made many acquaintances h such questions as, "Excuse me, I'm an erican—why are those people lining up r there?"; "What is that building?"; "Are u a student?" or "Where is such-and-such lace?"

Russians approached me in several ways. any of all ages came up as soon as they saw camera open and asked what kind it is. In ops where I was looking around to see what s for sale and perhaps noting down the ices, people often asked what I was doing. metimes, walking along the street alone in e evening, I would whistle Lullaby of Bird- nd or September in the Rain and kids would ck up the tune and whistle along with me. couple of times older people stopped to ll me that my whistling was "nekraviso" nproper).

The peasant markets, which I think are out the most interesting places in the Soviet nion, are fine places to meet people of the wer-income groups. Peasants from the sur- unding countryside bring produce grown on eir small private plots and city dwellers pay onsiderably more than official government rices for the better quality. You see cab- ages, potatoes, cucumbers, mushrooms and onions for sale. The liveliest spots in the markets are the meat stalls, where men and women fight to buy up the few choice cuts available.

Virtually all the young people I met are connected with universities, language institutes or various technical schools. They are absolutely aware of the nature of the system under which they live, and with very few exceptions, they are dissatisfied. The basis of this discontent is often purely material. The most desired Western products are clothes, automobiles, phonograph records, watches, books and cigarettes. With no hesitation at all they said that the quality of the same products, Soviet-made, is inferior.

In general, Soviet young people seem better trained in their special fields of study than most Americans, but outside such fields their knowledge is limited. They seem less lively than Americans of the same age and look older.

I do not recall meeting anyone over eighteen who did not drink, although many girls claimed to drink only a little. When they can afford it, they prefer vodka, but Georgian wine is popular too.

The fact that so many of the youth I met conduct their indoor social life, including sex and discussion sessions, in the room of someone who owns a radio indicates that the real reason for the popularity of Western radio is entertainment. Even the most serious young people would mention news secondarily after music.

They all know they must play ball with the regime, but the vast majority I met are merely going through the motions of being "good" Soviet citizens. In almost every conversation it was my definite impression that when young people refer to the system or to the Kremlin they think first of the Terror. They hope that they are wrong, but the majority think it will return. END agreed, "but let's see what it looks like tomorrow, the next day, and six weeks from now."

Same night. I'm so used to putting up my hair, I had started before I remembered workshop orders—"No pin curls. The whole point of having the permanent is to see if you can avoid the fuss and time it takes each day to set your hair." So to bed—blissful and hopeful.

Wednesday. JOURNAL friends comment: "Your hair looks terrific, what did you do to it?" By 5:00 P.M. I realized I had combed my hair only once all day. Before the permanent, I had to comb it at least half a dozen times to keep it looking neat.

Saturday. Still haven't had to put up my hair. Cooked dinner in hot, steamy kitchen for guests and emerged with hair still in curl. (Regular pin curls, without the permanent, would have drooped after I'd been in the kitchen ½ hour.)

Sunday. This morning I discovered my first "straggler." Put it up in one pin curl which dried in fifteen minutes.

SECOND WEEK

Monday. A week has gone by and aside from yesterday's straggler, haven't had to put my hair up at all. It hasn't separated and gone limp, the way it used to by the end of the week. Shampooed and set my hair this evening. There's lots of curl at the ends and it is surprisingly unfrizzy compared with the last $20 permanent I had!

Tuesday. Hair too curly this morning. Made the mistake of putting it up last night while it was very wet. Will be softer next week, when I towel-dry my hair to a damp stage, before setting.

THIRD WEEK

Wednesday. Shampooed my hair, let it dry, and (delight of delights) I didn't have to set the back at all. Used a touch of hair cream for the ends of my hair to make them softer and less flyaway. Also like to use a liquid spray to help keep my set in place.

FOURTH WEEK

Monday. Put up side sections every two o three days now, but don't have to touch th back.

FIFTH WEEK

Wednesday. By winding the curls at th sides tighter than I have been doing, they la three and four days at a time.

SIXTH WEEK

Tuesday. Had to have my hair trimme and shaped today and I was afraid this woul be the end of the permanent. But, happy da there is plenty of curl left on the ends. I'm sti a side-curl pinner-upper every three or fou nights, and now that the front sections at th forehead have been trimmed, I have to giv them occasional attention too.

For me, this six weeks' experiment has bee a great success. I've saved so much time. I'v looked so much more attractive. When thi permanent gives out—I have every intentio of starting all over again!

WE SAW HOW RUSSIANS LIVE

person owns only one, of people who get few baths, of cabbage and cooking and unwashed diapers. Everywhere you go this smell meets you, even in airplanes, theaters and restaurants.

MR. GOULD: In the more glamorous hotels and restaurants they spray the air with a strong oversweet perfume—we began to call it "Flowers of Spring"—always the same, to counteract the heavy smell of poverty.

MRS. GOULD: Thirteen people lived in this apartment. There were three families—each had a room. In one family there were six—two parents, three children, old granny—in one there were four; and in the other, three. The three families shared one kitchen and one toilet. There was no bathroom.

Mrs. X said, "My husband has worked for the same factory for twenty years and we can't get a better place. We live like pigs!" She kicked aside a sack of potatoes and showed us into her room, about twelve by twelve. It held two beds and a square eating table set with crockery, a worn enamel stew pan, a teakettle. We didn't notice at first a dark head on one pillow. She explained that her two grown sons slept in that bed in shifts—one during the day and one at night. She and her husband slept in the other cot-width iron bed, slightly partitioned off by a huge old-fashioned wardrobe. (Even in the newly built apartments there are rarely closets.) The room was so crowded with the possessions of four people that one could hardly move. There were four straight chairs, and a battered enormous armchair with clean, hand-crocheted doilies on the arms and back. The lace-curtained window was filled with green plants. There was a small-screen television set. Mrs. X opened another door to a small cubicle about five by six and one half feet. In it were a bed and, a few inches away, a crib. Sideways, you could slip between. Here slept a married son and his wife, then both at work, and their two-year-old child, then in a nursery. This room seemed neat and clean.

Three families—thirteen people in all—used the kitchen. Laundry is done here, too, drying in racks overhead or in the hall. The room is about nine feet by ten, with one four-burner gas stove and three small tables against the wall—one for each family—about the size of old-fashioned washstands, with cupboards below for pots and pans and two wooden hanging shelves above for dishes. And it was touching to me to see that the shelves were curtained with rather ragged but clean towels, each trimmed with tatting or crocheted lace. Later, almost invariably, we noticed the same attempts at homemaking—making things "nice."

There was a sink, but no refrigerator.

"I asked, "How do you all manage to cook in this kitchen?"

She was bitter. "We bump behinds all the time"—only the Russian colloquial word wasn't "behind."

Her husband was an engineer who earned about 1800 rubles a month—at least twice what the average worker makes. Her resentment centered round the fact that in spite of his faithful work twenty years in one place, he was unable to get them better living quarters. "Remember—this is our life," she said. "This is how we live." These were what in America we would, I suppose, call middle-income people, although in Russia everyone is a worker, theoretically, who is not an official, an artist or intellectual. Certainly they were not poor and the building was one of the better ones.

Of course we had no access whatever to the upper-class homes of officials or professional men. Such an exchange hardly exists, even for visitors who spend months in Russia. And we, deliberately, did not go into real slums or impoverished areas.

After our first trial, we managed to see quite a few apartments. If there was a bathroom, and if only two or three people lived in each room instead of six or seven, the women thought they were quite well off. We noticed everywhere flourishing green plants, the same sense of shoddy, poor, crumbling materials, and inferior workmanship even in the buildings completed in the last year or two. In style of architecture the newest buildings are like apartment houses built in New York fifty to sixty years ago. And everywhere these women, like women round the world, were trying to make the best of what they had: growing philodendron or asparagus fern; doing bits of embroidery—over a bed or sofa a piece of tapestry worked with a homelike design, a cottage or a kitten—or cross-stitched pillow covers, or crocheted lace. There were many television sets. One woman, better off than most (she and her husband had a room to themselves, and shared a kitchen with only five others), showed me very proudly her treasures. Three orange and scarlet and magenta stuffed birds, such as you might find in a ten-cent store here, under a glass bell. A plastic donkey with metal in his nose, that turned his head from side to side when you held a magnet to it. This delighted her. These people felt that they were quite well off "when you look around you."

We saw an old woman living alone in two basement rooms, one a damp, dingy, small kitchen. In the other, about six by nine, she slept, sat and ate. Her daughter, who formerly lived with her, was in a hospital with cancer. The mother received a pension of 500 rubles a month. Her husband had been a coachman in the czar's day. "Things were much better then, but they're better now than they were in the war, or before Stalin died. We live on potatoes and cabbage. Sometimes we get a little meat, but the meat is very poor. Do you get meat in America? Is it good? Tell me, in America do you have people as poor as us? They tell us you have very hard times there—lots of unemployment. Is that true?" However this old woman felt she was lucky to receive a pension, and vaguely reiterated a belief that times were getting better. "You've got to believe things are getting better."

When we asked to take pictures of her kitchen she showed the first signs of real fear, saying, "It might not be good for me." She had a small icon on the wall, said, "This has great meaning for me."

Question: Did many of the people you talked to ask questions about the United States?

MRS. GOULD: Yes, they did. The one question we were asked everywhere was, "Is it true that you are worse off in America than we are?" Or they would say, "Is it true that you have a great deal of unemployment?" When we finally succeeded in getting into some homes, I think it was the amazing opportunity for these Russian women to question someone from the "outside" that helped us. Partly, too, I'm sure, it was just natural human friendliness and curiosity. We liked these women we saw in their homes very much. They had a native friendliness, dignity and hospitality. One old, old lady bowed as we were leaving. "Thank you for coming to visit us."

Question: What about the income of these people?

MRS. GOULD: It's hard to translate income figures. The average worker earns from 750 to 800 rubles a month (say $75 to $80), although some highly paid factory workers make as much as 2000 (about $200.)

MR. GOULD: For rough purposes, you divide by ten. A thousand rubles is approximately one hundred dollars. But many things are not purchasable at all—or so high no one can buy them. A man's woolen suit, for instance, would cost him every ruble he could earn in two months, provided he makes about 800 rubles a month. Shoes cost roughly forty to sixty dollars and are highly prized.

MRS. GOULD: On the other hand, rent is cheap. A family living in one room and part of a kitchen pays from four to six dollars a month to the government, which assigns all living space to everyone—tells you where to live and how much space you will have.

Question: If that woman thought her apartment was so bad, couldn't she go somewhere else?

That real butter flavor is still nature's secret

Why does real butter make such a big flavor difference on hot foods? Because it's churned from 100% real cream, of course. Real cream is the heart and soul of its goodness, the source of the subtle flavor that agrees with you always. Just like milk, real butter belongs on your family table—and your family deserves real butter as much as your guests. Serve the best—serve real butter.

Party people keep all the control, the official jobs. Resentment toward nd the system is far greater and far more ntly indicated (of course, never openly sed) by the voiceless, powerless other ıs than I had expected—though the members are outnumbered twenty-five .

GOULD: We learned early how much a shrug, a pressure of the arm can signify used to avoid answering a question ly.

stion: Did you feel that the Russians you met have a sense of fear much of ıe?

s. GOULD: Most Russians have a few , family or friends—three or four— they trust. Beyond that group they are uarded. When we were trying to see the s, we found it unwise to approach two together. The second person tended to a brake. If a neighbor came up the n we were talking to usually became cautious. Several times people would by and eavesdrop, or even interrupt our rsation. In every apartment building disciplined people probably hold the in line. If one of these people over- us asking a question, she would bustle Don't you know you should go to the ntendent to ask such things?" Then the n we had been talking with would retreat diately, saying, "That was just what I elling them."

asked permission to photograph several inside the houses. We were given per- on only once. We were not allowed to graph any woman we interviewed. They olite but definite in their refusal. "There been cases where people have been graphed and the pictures were used in a ay and the people got into trouble. We you are friendly, and wouldn't do that, o, it isn't safe." [Note: "A bad way" s showing unfavorable aspects of Rus- ife.]

e other thing that seemed significant was n Moscow we were almost totally unsuc- il in seeing any homes. Having visited a number in Leningrad where we were d to sit down, talk and answer questions t America, we tried again in Moscow. sed all the knowledge we'd gained about est way to approach people, but it didn't e found that in Moscow—probably be- it is the center of government—people ed more fearful. There wasn't even the degree of freedom or gaiety or ease that is in Leningrad and in Odessa.

R. GOULD: Three different people, com- strangers, approached us during our time in Russia to ask if we could help escape from the country. They seemed r great strain. This happened when we not on a planned itinerary, so it could have been spontaneous, based on the gnition that we were three Americans, e, without an official guide.

Question: Did you get other clues as to how Russians feel about the regime?

MR. GOULD: Fortunately for us in the West, the Russians are educating their people. The only way to get ahead in Russia is by education. And one of the results of education, even under the Soviet system, is that your mind begins to work. The mind is a skeptical thing. If you begin to learn something and come to a dead-end street, you wonder why the street is blocked.

University students, those who have had access to Khrushchev's denunciation of Stalin, now hear what the outside has always known, that Stalin was a mass murderer. This turnabout has crystallized a cynicism among young people because it illustrates so clearly that they are told only what the leaders want them to hear.

MRS. GOULD: Even among older people you have the feeling that few except Party members really support this regime.

MR. GOULD: Those who do knowingly close their eyes to certain things. Once on a long drive in the country we talked with our Intourist chauffeur about many things, including the Poznan riots. Finally he said, "When you are looking for the truth, don't look at Poznan. You can find the truth by looking straight ahead. It just doesn't help to look to the side."

He added: "The people will be here longer than the regime. Regimes come and go, but the people will always be here. Now the people have hope."

Question: The people are still afraid to talk openly?

MRS. GOULD: Yes. They would never come into a public room and discuss things because they might be overheard. But on the street, if they trusted you, they might be less cautious. Or they answer indirectly. We heard this many times: "My belly is full, why should I complain?"

Our young interpreter and another American who also spoke Russian talked a lot to students. They would walk the streets late at night, in groups of not more than two or three lest they attract police attention. Russian boys would ask the Americans, "If we should defect, what would life be like for us outside? How would we live? Could we get a job?" And many of them said, "Don't think that the Russian people are behind the system. Don't make that mistake."

MR. GOULD: Although authorities say that universities are open to non-Party as well as Party people, this was not our impression. A university education is a plum for those who conform. Lately Khrushchev has been saying openly in speeches what the boys told us. If you do not subscribe to "communist ideals" the privilege of an education may be denied you.

MRS. GOULD: We felt that this thought suppression was resented more than the lack of material things—though the students want material benefits also.

Question: Do the students seem serious about their work?

MRS. GOULD: Yes, Russia has given prestige to learning—it is the road to advancement, especially in the technical fields and the sciences. Students are very earnest. We had never seen a group of young people with so little gaiety and joy. Even when a boy asks a girl to dance—we went to a big outdoor dance at Sochi—he does it with a dead-pan expression, and she rarely smiles in reply. Girls seem to have little coquetry, as though they had taken a sports goddess or a farmerette as their ideal and didn't want to seem too feminine. They have solidly built bodies, use no make-up, and their clothes are sturdy and poorly cut.

Rarely do you see lovely well-groomed hair, or the little gay accents women have used everywhere—ribbons, scarves, colored handkerchiefs. We decided the young people worked so hard and the pressure was so great they had little energy left to charm.

MR. GOULD: The university students are paid about 370 rubles ($37) a month in addition to adequate living quarters—small single rooms, bare, cell-like but complete and with privacy, are part of the huge Moscow University building. But 370 rubles is not quite a living even for a student, and must be supplemented in some way. Sometimes parents help out. Many of the boys go into black marketing. When they meet tourists or people from the seaports they buy almost anything from them and then sell it for a great deal more. This is because commodities of every sort are in such short supply in Russia.

MRS. GOULD: Our guides kept denying that there is such a black market, although there is, even in rubles, though that is highly punishable. When we asked in Leningrad where the "Flea Market" [Tolkuchka] was they said it no longer existed. The guides and taxi drivers all told us there used to be one, but not any more. This proved to be completely untrue.

MR. GOULD: Our young companion had heard of the Flea Market from the students. They said he could buy everything there from "an atomic bomb to bird's milk." Following their tip, we went into the country behind the Baltic Railroad station, one drizzly Sunday morning. The chauffeur made us walk the last mile, saying, "We are not allowed to drive down there. I have never seen it and of course I don't have to go to such a place to buy things." About a mile out of town people were streaming on foot toward a muddy fenced-off field surrounded by a few poor shacks. On the way, we were jostled by somber-faced people with suitcases, bundles under their arms, a small table atop a head. Thousands of people stood or milled around inside the enclosure, all holding in their hands something for sale—a clock, a pair of shoes, a comb, a mirror, an undershirt. Here a woman was holding in an open palm a few trinkets of jewelry. There, a shotgun, a camera. There were practically no raincoats and this would have been a day to wear or sell them. But raincoats are not for "workers"—they're for "higher-ups." When perhaps as many as seven or eight thousand people went there every Sunday, you would hardly think it possible for the official guide to keep saying something did not exist. Apparently Communist Party members accept this kind of doubletalk to foreigners as an ethical way of doing things. One of the principles laid down by Lenin was that it is perfectly proper to lie for the system.

Question: What about the children?

MRS. GOULD: Children are one of the bright spots in Russia. I visited several nursery schools. They take children from three months to four years. The majority of young children in cities go to nursery schools because the government wants the mothers to work, in fact working mothers pay only one third of the nursery fee. Those who don't work must pay the total price, which they can of course rarely afford. Children arrive at the nursery as early as seven in the morning and stay until the mother gets through work and calls for them. If the mother is on night shift, the children can sleep at the school. About one third of the children who go to nursery schools sleep there. They receive three or four good meals a day.

You recognize the rather frightening efficiency of the totalitarian state here, as the nursery schools seemed to me to be well staffed and well equipped. There is always, still, a large prominent picture of Lenin or of a smiling Stalin standing in a field of flowers, or welcoming a flock of little children. The children look clean, healthy and well dressed. By that I mean not only warmly but gaily and attractively dressed. They have good toys, and children in the parks have good little trucks and other playthings.

Older school children are well dressed too. The boys wear gray uniforms and look quite smart with little red scarves under their collars. They have many clubs and activities outside of but in connection with the school—mathematics clubs, science clubs, camera clubs. Wherever we went taking pictures we would see camera clubbers in neat gray uniforms usually taking pictures of us. They have good cameras. Every youngster is expected to have an interest, and work at it.

MR. GOULD: They have an organization which they compare to our Boy Scouts—we wouldn't agree to the comparison. It is called the Pioneers—it is the children's organization of the Communist Party. If you are a Pioneer you automatically go into the Komsomol when you become older. Then if you are good enough, one of the elect, you can get to be a Party member in your early twenties. They have most skillfully used every form of inducement and prestige. It is considered an honor to be a Komsomoletz. Only boys and girls who are good at sports and studies both are supposed to become members. And, in addition, all the good things come your way—like free summer camping, special privileges of all kinds.

MRS. GOULD: It seemed to us that one reason as many people support the regime as do was that it seemed to hold out hope for their children—education, health, the possibility of professional advancement. One woman, working in the street near the university, said to us proudly, "I helped build that building. Now my son goes there."

Question: Were the young people curious about life in the U.S.A.?

MR. GOULD: We had one copy of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL with us. We let some young people read it. They would hardly give it up. They would say, "Can I take it home overnight?"

MRS. GOULD: One morning I went to talk to the girls in the Intourist office. I was about to start packing so I said, "May I have my JOURNAL?" The girl didn't answer. We spoke of other things and ten minutes later I said, "Well, I'm going to pack now. Can I have my magazine?" She still didn't answer and then I saw that the young man at the head desk, her boss, was intently reading every page of the JOURNAL—and she didn't want to ask him to give it up till he'd finished.

Question: Could he read English?

MRS. GOULD: Yes. Almost all the people in the Intourist service speak English.

Question: Had any of these people ever seen a JOURNAL before?

MRS. GOULD: One girl said that a woman tourist who was there last summer had one.

Question: What interested them most in the magazine?

MRS. GOULD: They were primarily interested in the fashions and in pictures of houses and kitchens. Also in dieting stories. One of the solidly built Intourist girls decided to go on a diet and told me, "I only ate an apple for lunch." But a day later she said, "Who wants to be slim and weak like your American women!"

MR. GOULD: I'd like to interrupt to tell you of a pleasant, personal episode which came about quite accidentally. Because of bad weather we were off-loaded at a place called Simferopol, near Sevastopol and Yalta. Finally we found we would have to spend the night in this industrial town of a hundred and fifty thousand population.

For dinner, we went to a local restaurant called the Astoria. All good restaurants in Russia seem to be called either Astoria or Savoy. We had our usual caviar—the best thing there is to eat—and the orchestra started playing an excellent St. Louis Blues.

MRS. GOULD: We applauded and as we danced they played Stormy Weather, and Tea for Two, for us, delighted at our appreciation, smiling, bowing at us and we at them. They were really a marvelous orchestra.

When we were seated, a Russian man wearing a worker's leather jacket and with several stainless-steel teeth came up to our table, bowed and asked me to dance. It is considered correct there for a man to invite a stranger to dance if he asks her escort first. He was a good dancer, too, but I could only tell him so in my very poor German to which he replied, "Danke schön."

Question: When you told people about life in the United States, did you feel they believed what you said?

MR. GOULD: Probably not wholly. The first time someone tells them, "Oh no. In America we are not having hard times," they probably wouldn't credit it entirely. But if more and re tourists come in and tell them the truth, vill be almost impossible to perpetuate the lies. The most convincing thing, of course, uld be for them to have access to maga- es like the JOURNAL, or the Post, or Read- Digest. That is why I regret that the only gazine from the United States which the ssians can see is one which is officially nned for them, America—50,000 a month now sold in Russia. They feel that it's paganda. I wish, instead, they could have ess to the magazines bought and read by lions in this country. They would know, n, that they were getting a true picture.

Question: How did the trip affect your pre- us ideas about Russia?

MRS. GOULD: The system of oppression, of vernment domination, is more total, more ective, more appalling n I believed possible be- e I went in. But the peo- in many ways were more pealing.

MR. GOULD: I think our eign newspaper corre- ondents have told the th, but I don't think we lieve what we have been told by them. It is d to believe without a frame of reference.

MRS. GOULD: I have longed to send some our Intourist guides certain recent edi- ials in the New York papers so they could ow what the outside world is saying about ngary.

Question: Could you send them these edi- ials?

MRS. GOULD: I asked my husband and we cided to send a subscription to the LADIES' ME JOURNAL to the entire Intourist office Moscow. We don't want to send it to any e girl because it might be dangerous for her. we are sending it to the entire Intourist ice. To send critical editorials into Russia o might endanger the person to whom they re sent.

Question: Do you see any possibility that hin the next five or ten years the Russian ple may rise up against the existing regime?

MRS. GOULD: I think we all must feel this a critical time for them. They have had a nge in leadership. Present government ds know that Stalin went too far with the rror. They have denounced him as a scoun- l. By trying to give the people more oppor- nities, they hope to survive as leaders. If this ess to the outside world and to the truth es not come too fast—if living conditions in Russia continue to improve steadily as the people slowly but inevitably become aware how much better off other parts of the world are—it might be possible to bring about a gradual evolution to a freer, less oppressive government without violence. But if under- standing of how much they have been lied to comes faster than does an improvement in living conditions, in freedom, then it seems to us that the Soviet Government is in real trouble.

MR. GOULD: Especially if the people get to know that Soviet troops have often defected, or been successfully defied in certain in- stances—in Hungary, say.

MRS. GOULD: It is more a sense of the hope- lessness of combating the regime that keeps them in line than anything else. And if that should show any signs of cracking —

MR. GOULD: Of course the regime holds all the power weapons, even though, now, perhaps, the army is stronger than the secret police, MVD. And nowadays no one person- ally, completely controls the secret police, or the army, as Stalin once did.

MRS. GOULD: The greatest hope of a peace- ful solution would be if the leaders would per- mit more knowledge of the outside world to the ordinary man, and eventually there could be a free exchange of people, as in the demo- cratic world. Certainly they are not ready yet, and, from their government's point of view, I think what they are doing now—letting in Americans and other tourists—is dangerous.

MR. GOULD: A great deal depends on the satellite countries—whether they are violently suppressed, or some measure of freedom is granted. If the people get too restive there might be a return to the absolute Terror as it was under Stalin—all Russians dread this. Having had a taste of this much freedom (very little, of course, by our standards), the ques- tion is, would they fight to hold onto it? I think their youth is ready to rebel, and, appar- ently, Khrushchev fears this.

Question: Did you gain any feeling that the present leaders are insecure and that there may be a change of regime?

MR. GOULD: The people of Russia are ask- ing questions. They are thinking. They seemed to us to be resentful. What it all adds up to only the future will reveal. But we felt they are beginning to want their rights as workers, as individuals, as educated men and women.

THE PLIGHT OF THE OLD KITCHEN

Bob and Eleanor often stood in the door, king me over from ceiling to floor, and hing with discouragement. What to do first? viously I needed a new coat of paint, new or, better lighting. But Eleanor worried st about the things a woman is likely to tice. There was no working space; she had chop carrots and shape meat patties and l out dough on the same table that later ist be cleared and set for dining. The re- gerator door opened wrong—she was al- ys getting wedged between it and the table, burning her arm on the too-close hot-water es. I despaired of ever turning into the d of kitchen she wanted—light, sunny and arkling.

Even today I can hardly believe it! Yet re I am—the most popular room in the use. Now my walls are clear light yellow, woodwork gleaming white, and my floor vered with a pastel-flecked plastic material th a rubber backing that is actually soft derfoot. Eleanor's working space and stor- e problems are solved by two fine green astic-topped counters, and new cabinets and elves. The refrigerator was shifted to a bet- position, and recessed into a chimney ok. The old range with its failing insulation lded to a new electric one, complete with a shelf at the left, so the cook doesn't feel mmed in. Behind the range, the sink, too, walls have matte-finished plastic tile. Easy the eyes and easy to clean. Eleanor finds at the curved extension of one counter makes a convenient spot to sit, writing grocery lists or talking on the handy wall telephone.

My day begins at seven and I'm kept busy until midnight. That's because there are so many meals to prepare. Take breakfast. Bobby, a husky teen-ager, eats his toast, orange juice and cocoa while Eleanor bustles about preparing his lunch: sandwiches, fruit, homemade cake or cookies. After Bobby has dashed off to catch the 7:30 school bus, Eleanor has her breakfast. Usually she's not quite finished with her coffee and newspaper when Chuck appears, and there's another breakfast and lunch to pack. (This lunch is fancier, with carrot sticks and celery curls.) And by the time Chuck goes and Eleanor finishes the dishes, Bob is awake and hungry.

Bob works from three until midnight. This means Eleanor cooks two major meals a day—one for her husband at noontime, one for the boys in the evening. Four separate breakfasts, two dinners and three box lunches to prepare daily, plus after-school snacks, baking after- noons, and bedtime refrigerator raids—all these keep a mother pretty constantly in the kitchen. That's why I see so much of Eleanor, and why it's so important that she's satisfied with me. If it's good food that wins a man's heart, surely what makes a woman happy is a pleasant place to cook that good food.

Today I'm the kind of kitchen every kitchen ought to be—good to look at, easy to work in, and best of all, a room for the whole family to enjoy.

THE LOW-FAT DIET

in the diet, one must consider the invisible as well as the visible fats of both animal and vegetable sources.

In the book, LOW-FAT COOKERY, are outlined two plans which will keep the average intake of total fat at either 25 grams per day or 50 grams per day. We have devised and compiled menus and recipes for a sample week which will provide a tempting variety without excessive quantities of fat. These same methods can be used in planning delicious meals in weeks to follow.

The amounts specified in these menus will be equal to usual servings and given in cup measures. Each day's menus have no more than 50 grams of fat per day per person.

RECIPES AND MENUS

VEAL ROLL-UPS IN TOMATO SAUCE

Mix 4 tablespoons grated onion with 1½ cups soft bread crumbs, 2 tablespoons minced parsley, ¼ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Blend well with 3 tablespoons water in which 1 chicken bouillon cube has been dissolved. Pound 6 slices veal thin as for scaloppine, or perhaps your butcher will cut and pound it for you. Spread each slice of veal with some of the stuffing. Cover with a thin slice of cooked tongue, cut if possible the same size as the veal. Roll and fasten securely with thread. Sauté in a skillet in 1 tablespoon hot butter until evenly browned. Remove from the pan and roll in paper toweling to absorb the excess fat. Drain the skillet. Then into the skillet pour two 8-ounce cans tomato sauce and ½ cup water. Season with 1 tablespoon chopped parsley, ¼ teaspoon thyme, ½ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Simmer, covered, for 45 minutes until rolls are tender. Remove thread and serve rolls with rice or noodles. Makes 4 servings.

CRANBERRY SHERBET

In a saucepan, cook 2 cups cranberries in 1¼ cups water until the skins pop. Press through sieve. Add 1 cup sugar to cranberry pulp. Return to saucepan. Cook until sugar is dissolved. Remove from heat. Add 1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin, softened in ¼ cup cold water. Mix well. Cool. Add 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Mix. Pour into freezer tray. Freeze 2–3 hours in freezing compartment of refrigerator set at coldest position until firm, stirring twice. Makes 1 pint or 4 servings.

RAISIN DROP COOKIES

Add ½ teaspoon cream of tartar to 3 egg whites. Make a soft meringue by beating in ¾ cup sugar—2 tablespoons at a time. Sift together 1½ cups flour, 3 teaspoons baking powder, ½ teaspoon salt and a dash of mace and allspice. Fold into the egg-and-sugar meringue. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and ¼ cup raisins with the last addition of flour. Drop by teaspoons on a lightly greased baking sheet. Bake in moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 10 minutes.

WILTED CUCUMBERS WITH DILL

Peel and score 2 medium-sized cucumbers. Slice thin. Arrange in layers in a bowl, salting each layer generously. Cover and let wilt in the refrigerator for several hours. Then press out the salt water that forms. Add 1 teaspoon sugar. Dilute ⅓ cup vinegar with enough water to make ½ cup. Pepper the cucumbers and pour the diluted vinegar over them. Sprinkle with 1 tablespoon fresh dill or ½ tablespoon dried dill. Let stand in the refrigerator about 1 hour to marinate. Makes 4 servings.

BAKED ALASKA

Bake an angel-food cake layer in an 8″ or 9″ pan, using a half package of angel-food cake mix. In some areas you can buy angel layers in the grocery store. Place on a heavy wooden board covered with lightly oiled brown paper. Make a meringue by adding ⅔ cup sugar gradually to 5 stiffly beaten egg whites and beat until the meringue stands in soft peaks. Heap Frozen-Strawberry Filling (see recipe on page 77) in center of cake 1″ from the edge. Generously swirl the meringue over top and sides, including the cake. Seal all areas carefully. Bake in hot oven, 450° F., until lightly brown, about 5 minutes.

FRENCH SALAD DRESSING WITH PECTIN

Mix together in a jar ½ cup water, 3 tablespoons lemon juice and 2 tablespoons powdered pectin. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper and paprika. Add 1 large clove garlic, slashed in several places with a knife. Allow dressing to stand for several hours. Shake well before using. Makes 1 cup dressing.

BAKED TOMATOES

Cut off the tops of 4 medium-sized tomatoes. Scoop out a small part of the center pulp. Mix together ¼ teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon sugar, ¼ teaspoon onion powder, ⅛ teaspoon basil, ⅛ teaspoon orégano and a dash of pepper. Sprinkle the tops of the tomatoes with this mixture. Top with ½ cup cracker crumbs. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 20 to 30 minutes or until the tomatoes are tender.

HAMBURGERS WITH ONION GRAVY

Make 4 thick patties from 1⅓ pounds ground lean round steak. Make a deep print in each patty with the tip of a teaspoon. Sprinkle skillet with a thin layer of salt. Heat. Place hamburgers in skillet, print side up. Cook until patties are browned. Remove to broiler rack. Fill each print with ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. Place under broiler and broil until done. Add 3 tablespoons flour and ¼ cup water to skillet. Stir to make a smooth paste. Gradually add ¾ cup hot water and ½ package dehydrated onion-soup mix. Cook and stir to make a smooth gravy. Serve hamburgers on platter and pour gravy over them.

CHERRY WHIP

In a saucepan, heat to boiling point a 1-pound can red pitted cherries. Meanwhile, soften 2 teaspoons unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup cold water. Add ½ cup sugar to cherries. Stir until dissolved. Remove cherries from heat. Drain, reserving juice. Dissolve gelatin in hot juice. Chill until thickened. Beat 2 egg whites and a pinch of salt until stiff but not dry. Fold into thickened mixture with cherries. Pour into 4 individual dessert dishes. Chill. Makes 4 servings.

TOASTED ROLLS WITH CRAB SALAD

To 3 cups boned cooked crab meat, fresh or canned, add 1 cup diced celery. Flavor with the juice of ½ lemon, 1 small onion, grated, ¼ cup finely minced parsley and ½ cup Special Mayonnaise. (Recipe on page 77.) Season with salt, pepper and a dash of hot red-pepper sauce. Fill toasted soft rolls with the salad and a piece or two of crisp lettuce. Fills 8 rolls.

ROCK CORNISH GAME HENS

Thaw 4 frozen Rock Cornish game hens as directed on package. Remove giblets. Rinse hens in cold water. Dry. Place on rack in uncovered roasting pan, breast side up. Salt and pepper hens. Dissolve 2 chicken bouillon cubes in 1¾ cups boiling water. Add ¼ cup lemon juice. Pour over hens. Roast in a hot oven, 425° F., for 1 hour. Baste frequently. Serve garnished with slices of orange topped with currant jelly. If you wish to serve the hens with rice and gravy, simmer giblets in not only about flying—a strange world to most of them—but about life almost everywhere.

MOTHER TAKES OVER THE CLASS

Thursday evenings became a time for lively discussions of the parents' own experiences, with suggestions back and forth. By the end of the year 47 parents had qualified for temporary teaching certificates by putting in five full days in class. Many have decided to go back to school and earn their education degrees so they can teach on a permanent basis. They know they will have to take the work a little at a time when they can fit it in with teaching and home duties—many will not complete the requirements for years—but they will be ready when their children are old enough for them to be able to be away from home every day.

The parents use the $17.50 a day substitute-teachers' pay for baby sitters and taxi fares to school, little extras at home and to help pay for education courses at nearby Hofstra and Adelphi colleges. But the pay does not swell home budgets greatly. "For almost everyone I know it has meant a sacrifice," says Margaret McMorrow, "in rearranging schedules, getting someone to come in and look after the children and putting off their own housework. They do it because they're enthusiastic about it."

But if the experience does not bring overnight wealth, it is richly satisfying in other ways, the young mothers feel. "It's waked me up," said one. "I've always loved my home, but I'd got into a mental rut. Now I'm creatively interested in it." Many feel the children they have known at school have helped them understand their own better. "Mine don't seem like such monsters," said another, "when I see other eight-year-olds making noise and having the same sort of shortcomings."

I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them, but to inform their discretion by education. THOMAS JEFFERSON

Peggy O'Sullivan likes to remember the day she had hall duty and Robert came to the door. She called him over and they talked a few minutes before he ran out to rejoin his friends. "I heard one of the little boys ask him 'What did the teacher want with you?'" she recalls. "And he said—and he sounded really proud about it—'Oh, she didn't want anything, she's my mother!'"

JOURNALITIES

Mary Lea Page

In the opinion of the JOURNAL staff there should be such really worth-while national contests as "Youngest-Looking Grandmother of 1957." MARY LEA PAGE might win. Mary Lea (nicknamed "Biffie" after her Princeton football-playing father) is admittedly tall, many say handsome, definitely slim. Biffie's editorial job makes her deal with literary agents, writers, publishers, cartoonists. She says, "Never having lost the layman's awe of literary creativeness, I am always nonplused to realize how very 'old shoe' most authors are. Their wells go dry, their heaters collapse, their children get measles, their dogs bite the meter man, even as yours and mine. In spite of all, they continue to create stories and I continue to regard them as bigger than life size. My pet peeves," she adds, "are bigots, braggarts and people who can't listen. My favorite pastime is playing with my two young grandchildren and trying to plant 50,000 bulbs on our new place in Chester County."

Howard Swiggett

HOWARD SWIGGETT, author of The Durable Fire, a new novel beginning page 66, is just the person to be writing about the people he's writing about—he's a delightfully successful man, just as his characters are, for the most part, delightful and successful people. Mr. Swiggett's books (a previous one is being made into a movie now) come to his agent written in a left-handed longhand scrawl, but this can be forgiven Mr. Swiggett, a handsome man, a Commander of the Order of the British Empire, and an accomplished lecturer on the subject Beauty in Women.

Robin White

ROBIN WHITE, son of American missionary parents, was born twenty-seven years ago in South India, spent most of his early life there. "My background more or less demands to be written about," he says, "and it has been my aim to use my knowledge of things Indian to promote a broader understanding between East and West." After this rather serious statement we hasten to add that The Big Secret (page 68) does just that—but in a most amusing and lighthearted manner. Today Mr. White lives in Old Saybrook, Connecticut, with his wife, three children, a collie named Dougie, and "a solicitous but unnamed cat of doubtful origin." What little time he can spare from his family and his writing (he's now launched on a historical novel) he spends on gardening, carpentry and ancient books on India.

Our READERS WRITE US

But What Was She Reading?

Ypsilanti, Michigan

Dear Sir: As you can see, we have been reading the JOURNAL in our family for a good many years. (If you have a use for this photograph, I'm sure the sitter could be persuaded to release it for publication!)

Early fan.

Very truly yours,
DEAN A. CLARK

Practice What We Preach?

Minneapolis, Minnesota

Dear Editors: You've had some good articles on helping young people to have higher standards, and I liked your Commercialization of Sex forum several months ago. But do you practice what you preach? I counted fourteen ads in this month's JOURNAL which exploited sex—and your own covers often have SEX in big red letters right across the front. If you're really serious about this subject, why don't you be pioneers and take the first step by cleaning up your own magazine?

Very truly yours,
MRS. GLENN JOHNSON

▶ We think sex is a perfectly respectable word and that it doesn't become less so on a JOURNAL cover—not so long as the article inside is constructive, worked out with doctors, clergymen or educators (depending on the range of the discussion). When we announce such articles on the cover, we do so because we believe they are of special importance and interest; and the letters we receive from husbands and wives, doctors and clergymen confirm this belief.

Advertisers who use the JOURNAL'S pages to show their products quite naturally wish to make them as appealing as possible. A manufacturer of lingerie, for example, will usually choose a pretty girl as a model, and she undoubtedly will have sex appeal. Since there is a good reason for her to be shown as she is, we do not feel that photographs of this type should be ruled out of the magazine. We do, however, refuse several hundred thousand dollars' worth of advertisements annually—which some magazines publish—because such advertisements seem objectionable to us, either because of the pictures used, the phrasing employed or the subject matter advertised. This has always been the policy of The Curtis Publishing Company, and was originated by Cyrus H. K. Curtis, whose high standards were well known to all in his day. In fact, no popular magazines in the world screen their advertising more carefully to keep all their pages suitable for the entire family than the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL and The Saturday Evening Post.—ED.

"Safety-First" Eyeglasses

Dallas, Texas

Dear Editors: How many mothers of children who wear glasses know that they can buy shatterproof lenses? My enlightenment came not from doctors but from a playground director after our son got pulverized glass in his eye.

Dick now has lenses which can also break but will not disintegrate like ordinary ones. These shatterproof lenses are a little bit thicker and slightly higher priced, but the safety feature more than offsets these slight disadvantages. In the hope that some child may be spared serious eye damage, may I pass the word along through my long-time favorite publication, the L.H.J.? Sincerely,
MRS. R. R. HEIDER

Tomatoes vs. Potatoes

Forest Hills, New York

Dear Editors: Why is it that women's magazines such as the JOURNAL devote page after page to "How to keep your husband happy, how to look attractive for your husband, how to help your husband's career," etc., while men's magazines devote page after page to photos of exquisite girls (in Bikinis) who make the average housewife look like a potato? Sincerely,
MRS. GEORGE ROSENFELD

Panacea for Panned Parenthood

Maumee, Ohio

Dear Editors: Parenthood is being panned with increasing enthusiasm by those who see the genesis of all the world's ills in today's youth. As a result, parents are becoming unsure of themselves.

For this is the Age of Experts. But the experts don't often agree, and this is disconcerting to parents who earnestly desire to do right. So, come out of the doghouse, mom and pop, and give heed to a few fundamental principles which may give you heart:

1. All first children should be born last, preferably the last of twelve.

2. Have more than one child. Have several. Practice may not make perfect in parenthood, but you have more chances of hitting the bull's-eye.

3. Most of your children's faults come from the other side of the family. This is not a subject for dinner-table conversation, but comes in handy when talking to the child's teacher.

4. Very few teachers readily understand children, especially your child. If they say nice things about him, then you are in a very superior school system. If they don't, it's lack of rapport.

5. There is no such thing as a normal child. All children are different from all other children. Comparisons are odious, and most parents worry too much about what other people think.

6. A child has a perfect right to make mistakes. Don't deny him the educational experience, which was vouchsafed you, of making a fool of himself now and then.

7. Let the schools educate your child. That's what you pay taxes or tuition for.

8. Children should be regarded as guests in the house once in a while. It will bring

Why do you suppose the manufacturer put a box of Tide in your new automatic?

"I recommend Tide for every automatic," says Norbert Badtke of Milwaukee, Wis. "When you service top-loading automatics, you really understand them. And I've discovered that starting folks off with Tide gives them the kind of clean clothes that makes them rave about their automatics!"

...so your automatic will give you the cleanest clothes possible!

"Next to me . . . Mommy likes Tide-clean sheets."

Maybe you've thought there isn't much difference in the matter of cleanness. Oh, but there is! You'll discover that as soon as you take your first fluffy, sweet-smelling Tide wash from the dryer or line. You know, Tide brought you the greatest cleaning power the washday world had ever known, and that cleaning power has never been surpassed. No washday product made, nothing can beat Tide for getting clothes clean. Next washday, hang out a Tide-clean wash!

THE CLEANEST CLEAN POSSIBLE IS TIDE-CLEAN

The Picture of Health for March

by MAXINE DAVIS

Nothing was fun around our house. Nobody was sick—just cranky and cross. My husband's business was good. The girls' grades in school were excellent. What was the matter?

I knew my trouble. Every time I took a deep breath a strategic strap would break. I was wearing clothes I could get into, not ones that do something for me. My spouse had a suspicious bulge above his belt.

We were over-nourished! Depressing! I don't have to look up medical references to prove that overweight causes personality changes. I was embarrassed about my looks. My husband's extra pounds were as much of a burden as if they were bricks in his briefcase; they made him tired. When we're gloomy the children aren't happy.

"But a low-calory regime makes us even more irritable," I complained to our druggist.

"Try KESSAMIN" he suggested.

We are. We're slimming—and gay again!

The KESSAMIN PLAN consists of a scientifically designed diet supplemented by tablets containing all essential nutritional vitamins plus a harmless ingredient that makes you feel a smaller amount of food is all you can hold.

We're going to keep on using KESSAMIN when we're back to normal—and keep that way.

Grandfather was grumpy and low-spirited too. His new store teeth clattered like a train of empty freight cars.

While the old darling brooded I shopped—and found ORAFIX, an adhesive that holds his dentures firmly in place, for 24 hours if necessary. Now he talks normally, easily eats peanuts, corn on the cob, and other difficult foods, and enjoys them because ORAFIX, itself tasteless and odorless, doesn't affect flavor.

I also bought him ORA for cleansing his grinders, for ordinary brushing would wear down and ruin them. He puts them with ½ teaspoonful of ORA in a glass of water and after 20 minutes—or overnight—they're clean and fresh. He has no repellent "denture breath." ORA and ORAFIX make grandfather happy as the baby.

This March weather, sometimes bitter winter, sometimes balmy spring is hard on everybody's throat. Air is damp; schools and offices are hot. Result—somebody in the family is sure to have a voice like a fog-horn, not from illness but from just an irritated throat.

As soon as I hear a rasping "Morning Mom," I dole out our NEW-AQUA-DRIN lozenges. Their soothing anesthetic action relieves the harshness and discomfort and their additional antibiotic content (tyrothrycin) guards against secondary infection so likely at this season.

Our youngsters swim downtown at the pool. Some mothers worry for fear their children will pick up athlete's foot around the pool or in the shower or locker room, because the fungi that cause it have been thought to lurk in such places.

Recent studies indicate that the fungi are probably on people's skin most of the time, from childhood on, but only cause trouble when resistance is lowered.

So we build foot health with OCTOFEN. One application of OCTOFEN Powder to washed and thoroughly dried feet is a first-class preventive.

We don't worry; we know if anyone does contract athlete's foot, OCTOFEN in either liquid or powdered form is the answer. OCTOFEN starts working after 15 seconds' contact. True, treatment may continue from one day to several weeks, depending upon the severity of the condition, but eventually it will heal the infection.

Well-documented reports indicate that no other fungicide has ever been so successful. Used at the Marathon Foot Races; the National Foot Health Council approves it exclusively—and so do we!

A Foreign Policy For ALL Americans

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

PHILADELPHIA MUSEUM OF ART

COURTYARD SEEN FROM A WINDOW, lithograph by Pierre Bonnard (French School, 1867–1947). Bonnard ranks with Vuillard and Toulouse-Lautrec among the founders of modern color lithography. Size, 13⅝″x10¼″.

SDhahran, Saudi Arabia
ome months ago I was asked to discuss American foreign policy with a panel of wives of servicemen, the discussion to be broadcast and televised to the hundreds of stations throughout the world where American women and their children are beside the husbands and fathers who are guarding "the ramparts we watch."

The question that was put by the extremely attractive and responsibility-minded service wives as the central theme of the discussion was, "What can we women do to help the foreign policy of the United States? And what is American foreign policy?"

That is not, indeed, an easy question for anyone to answer. Foreign policy is being made from day to day, by every action taken by the United States that involves nations other than our own. The central aim of every American foreign policy and action is the defense of the best interests of the United States. The Secretary of State, no less than the Secretary of Defense, is part of the defense system.

We live in a world of sovereign states, some of them very old, with long-established "spheres of interest" brought about by imperial conquests or treaties negotiated with foreign rulers, the sudden ending or breaking of which can cause serious disturbances, even catastrophic ones, for all the nations involved.

At the same time new states have arisen in the world, in Asia, Africa and the Middle East, among peoples who have for centuries been ruled by others. In population, these new states far outnumber all the so-called "great powers" of the earth combined. But in power reckoned in terms of organized armies, industrial development and potential, economic organization and political experience, they are inferior to any one of the larger, older and more "advanced" nations. But they, too, are sovereign states, and precisely the ones most jealous of their new-found sovereignty.

Generations of foreign rule have left resentments and suspicions that continue even after the rule has ended, and a rejection of the plain fact that the foreign rule has brought great benefits, as well as evils, with it. If it were possible to wipe out of any Afro-Asian country everything that the Western empires have contributed to establish in them, those countries would be reduced to the most primitive material state, and in some cases to savagery.

Furthermore, if everything brought by Western rule were obliterated from memory, even the ideas that have sparked rebellions, raised the demand for independence, and created the states themselves, would be lacking. For these are Western ideas, and to an enormous extent the leadership, armies, ministries, bureaucracies of the new Eastern states are staffed by men who have been educated in British, French, Dutch and American universities, or trained in Western-organized and -commanded armies. So that with all the misunderstandings, and even hatreds, there exist mental affinities which are especially noticeable among the experts of the new states. To put it simply, however their governments may be at loggerheads, the Minister of Public Health in any Eastern country will be eager to share knowledge and experience with a similar official from the West—and may even discover that he is invisibly wearing the same "old school tie."

In a generation as revolutionary as this one, the task of steering a foreign policy in such a way as best to promote the security and long-range interests of the United States demands wisdom, foresight and analytical powers beyond the capacities of any individual. The possibilities of error in any specific action can hardly be overrated.

All heads and leaders of states, furthermore, operate under continual pressures of public opinion, which in turn is formed or influenced by enormous propaganda apparatuses as well as by objective journalistic reports. Radio alone has enlarged to an incalculable degree the participation of the public. A generation ago events occurring in the capitals of their countries were unknown to millions who never saw a newspaper, and could not read one if they did. Today even a jungle savage knows to some degree what is happening in the country where he lives or elsewhere in the world. He hears of it, although he cannot read of it. And this adds a new element to the picture. For centuries, in much of the world, the common man, or "the masses," had not been reckoned with at all. No explanations were needed for the vast dumb mass of the people, whether their rule was native or foreign. Today, no matter what the form of government, and no matter how oligarchic or tyrannical, it operates under universal listening ears.

And all this, even in the most advanced democratic countries, makes the conduct of foreign policy more difficult, and even more dangerous; for errors, or what the people believe to be errors, can bring about popular rebellions and the downfall of governments.

Now, the people, even in so advanced and well-informed a country as the United States, cannot possibly know all the considerations that lead its government to take this or that stand or action in any given situation. None of us has continuous access to all the confidential information that pours daily into every foreign office, including our own. In addition, human prejudice, though it cannot be accurately assessed, cannot be ruled out, and human error is at all times constant. The greatest political leader, the most objective and percipient diplomat, is not God. His judgment, like all human judgments, is fallible.

All this sounds very discouraging, and it should discourage all who think that somehow, by some nonexistent wisdom and some nonexisting formulas, struggle, conflict, danger will somehow resolve themselves and usher in an era of eternal peace and good will among men and nations.

But does it mean that you and I, the service wives and their CONTINUED ON PAGE 20

A FOREIGN POLICY FOR ALL AMERICANS

serving husbands, and all the rest of us, who are engaged during most of our waking hours in limited tasks, interests and hobbies, had better give up thinking about American foreign policy?

No, it does not. But we must, I believe, try to think in wider, long-range terms.

The United States, from its very birth, has stood for national freedom and the right of self-government. The Declaration of Independence is our original charter of national and personal freedom. And it is, at the same time, a charter of freedom for all mankind. We did not declare that all Americans were created equal and endowed with certain inalienable rights. We declared that all men—all mankind—are so created and endowed.

This sense of an American mission to uphold freedom and equality everywhere, this great liberal doctrine (in the only explicable meaning of the word "liberal") runs through all our patriotic speeches, state papers, national songs and patriotic poetry. It has perpetually frustrated or restrained all the imperialist jingoists who have arisen in America. We simply cannot behave like ourselves—we cannot behave naturally—when we cease to uphold this doctrine. It is the hallmark of America, by which we are recognized, either to be hated or to be loved.

America has ever been the country of the underdog, of the so-called (and, I think, mis-

Nothing is more unbearable than the man who is never in the wrong, unless it is the man who thinks he is always in the right. BALZAC called) common man. We have welcomed to our shores (not always, certainly, for the noblest reasons) all sorts and conditions of men, and the millions of immigrants who have come have been those who have been most oppressed at home, whether by poverty or by social status. No country ever undertook a more hazardous experiment, in faith that not only a state but a cohesive nation could be created out of people from many nations, a large proportion of them, in the eyes of their former nationals, being "the scum of the earth." Yet out of those people, struggling upward in freedom, we have created a nation mighty in power. So another article of the American faith, for which we are known throughout the earth, is faith in people. We have not been consistent to this faith at all points. No people are wholly consistent, or ever will be, short of the millennium. But it is a basic underlying faith.

America is both materialistic and generous. I think we are far too materialistic, as every reader of my articles in this publication knows. But we wear our materialism with a difference. Americans abhor poverty, not out of materialism alone but also out of conscience. We just do not believe that suffering is good for the soul. The American ideal, shared by rich and poor alike, is that everybody should have a decent standard of living, everybody enjoy leisure, everybody have access to education and recreation. The ideal has influenced the whole capitalist structure of this country, which differs radically from that of many others. Our enterprise is not only "private," it is social. Our businesses are not organized on the basis of the highest possible profit for the lowest possible investment of money and energy, but on the basis of the lowest possible profit per unit of production made possible by the widest possible distribution of goods and services. American business does not see the worker as a coolie to be driven, but as a consumer to be satisfied. For an American, wealth is not something to be hoarded but to be spent, and this is both the basis of our giving at home and abroad, and also of our dynamic economy.

Finally, Americans believe in the rule of law—which includes a great many things, such as sanctity of contract. And without some respect for and means of enforcing contracts there is no civilization, as Mr. Justice Holmes once remarked.

America's belief in the United Nations, shared to the same extent by no other great power, arises from the conviction that there must be international laws restraining the actions of all states, and limiting their sovereign right to do anything they please.

The Charter of the United Nations prohibits states from going to war except in self-defense. This means that it outlaws preventive wars. In so doing, it sets a formidable restriction on the sovereign rights of nations, which throughout history have accepted as part of their sovereignty the right to start a war as well as to repel an aggressor.

An evolving state of consciousness and conscience will, it is to be hoped, result in restrictions of other kinds. The struggle for liberty and self-government does not equate with the right of every rebel movement to commit ghastly crimes—to slaughter women and children in their beds, to plunder, to torture and mutilate prisoners. It does not equate with the right to deport whole populations, or render insufferable the lives of foreigners long established in their homes. There will never be a real international law, written or unwritten, until certain basic tenets of civilization itself are revived and universalized. States always carry for generations the brand marks of the means by which they were established. It is better to wait awhile for liberty than to defile it by the means through which it is obtained. And equality is bogus unless coupled with equal responsibility.

But to come to the point and close this article: Every American, at home, or wherever he is in the world, and whatever his position, upholds American foreign policy when he thinks and acts in accordance with the American faith.

He is helping to show America's true face to the world when he shows sympathy for the aspirations of all people to national freedom and equality; when he looks down on no one because he is poor, or backward, remembering that a century ago Europeans looked down on us for that reason; when he looks for things to praise rather than blame, and to encourage, rather than deplore. He is representing America when his heart, as well as his purse, is generous. He represents America when he finds no sympathy with force or brutality, for whatever reason it is employed. He is representing America and furthering the only possibly successful American foreign policy whenever he shows that he believes that power can be properly used only to support such standards of justice and law as already exist and to promote their extension and refinement.

He is representing America and furthering American foreign policy when he thinks and acts patiently, when he keeps in mind the convulsions shaking this epoch, without losing his faith that in basic matters more things unite than divide mankind; that the love of freedom is universal, as is the desire to lift oneself out of darkness into light, out of ignorance into knowledge, out of squalor into decency, out of sickness into health, out of perpetual danger into security, and out of ever-pending war into peace.

There is no country I have ever visited in the world, including the one from which I write, where these desires are not manifest at every turn. And those who go with this tide in the affairs of men, whatever the setbacks and frustrations, will not fail—not in the long run.

How important is breast feeding?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DR. SPOCK

"What convinces me most about nursing is the glowing enthusiasm of the mother who has done it."

FONSS/AGRIVES

"Breast feeding quickly fosters the mother's sense of adequacy and happily convinces her and her baby that they were made for each other."

One aspect of child care in which we haven't made a great deal of progress in America is breast feeding. There has certainly been more interest shown in recent years, and more effort made by mothers, doctors and nurses. I hope that there has been an actual increase in the number of mothers who have succeeded. But in the parts of the country I know about, it's still true that most babies are bottle-fed. Some mothers prefer not to try at all. A considerable majority of those who do try decide, by the time the baby is a month or so old, that there isn't enough breast milk and give up. There are relatively few mothers who continue to nurse until the baby is ready to be on the cup in the latter half of the first year. The professional people like myself who want very much to encourage breast feeding are in a cross fire between two groups of women. One group, the skeptics, say in effect, "Well, if you doctors have no scientific proof that babies who are carefully bottle-fed are any less healthy or less happy than breast-fed babies, then what are you fussing about?" The other group, the vigorous advocates, say, "If you believe in breast feeding, why don't you tell everybody how vital it is, and persuade more women to do it?"

It doesn't seem to me that there is an answer that will really satisfy either group.

What convinces me most about nursing is the glowing enthusiasm of the mother who has done it—she speaks of her delight in being able, herself, to give her baby what he most desires and what no one else can give him, of the feeling of love this engenders in her and also in him, as his fond look shows, and of the physical pleasure she feels. She also emphasizes the great practical advantages of nursing, day and night, at home and away from home. In other words, breast feeding quickly fosters the mother's sense of adequacy and happily convinces her and her baby that they were made for each other. That's a wonderful way to start any new relationship. To be sure, the same end result can be reached with bottle feeding, but it doesn't come so easily or so dramatically.

There are other advantages too. Breast feeding fosters the return of the uterus to its nonpregnant condition. Breast milk remains pure even if the mother is a careless person, or if the refrigeration is inadequate. Its easier digestibility and its perfect balance of ingredients make it particularly valuable for certain babies.

But it seems to me that we professional advocates and lay advocates of breast feeding should not put pressure on young women who are reluctant, since we don't necessarily know their basic reasons and since we haven't been able to show many of those mothers who do want to try how to succeed. If mothers become convinced of the superiority of nursing and then fail, they are left feeling inadequate and guilty.

In this article I want to discuss some of the attitudes that discourage breast feeding, and see whether there are any remedies.

In an indirect sense, the most important cause of the decline of breast feeding is the safeness of bottle feeding which has been achieved in the twentieth century. In previous times a mother knew that if she did not nurse her baby he ran quite a risk of severe illness or even death from intestinal infections. So mothers, doctors, nurses left no stone unturned to make a success of it. But now that bottle feeding has been made safe and successful—through better dairy methods, pasteurization, careful formula making, better refrigeration—breast feeding has truly become a matter of choice. This choice opens the door to a variety of attitudes on the part of mothers and doctors, and a variety of methods.

Some women know ahead of time that they'd rather not. One woman perhaps tried with a previous baby, experienced only frustration and doesn't want to put herself through it again. I sympathize with her feelings, though I'd never admit she couldn't succeed until I'd gone through it with her once myself.

Quite a few women, especially those waiting for their first baby, shy away from the idea of nursing, saying that it would tie them down too much. This is a complicated reason to answer, because it covers several different situations. It's certainly a factual statement if a woman wants to be free to accompany her husband on a spur-of-the-moment business trip or on an unexpected vacation without the baby. It's also true if a woman must leave home by 8 every morning for a 9-to-5 job, because this would cut out two consecutive breast feedings every day and that is enough seriously to discourage the breasts. On the other hand, some women with part-time jobs or flexible jobs have been able to nurse conveniently. If the milk supply has become well established (by the time the baby is a month old), it's usually possible to substitute regularly one bottle feeding a day without discouraging the breast milk supply. This would mean that the mother could be away from home up to six or seven hours in one stretch—for instance, from 10:30 A.M. to 5:30 P.M. Or a mother who wants to feel free to be away occasionally up to seven hours, for shopping or a visit, can use the relief bottle as often or as rarely as she wishes. In regard to the evening, most babies are willing, by the time they are one or two months old, to postpone the evening feeding until midnight, which would let the mother off from 7 P.M. to 12 if she has an active social life. (It's usually not practical to substitute a bottle in the evening, because if the breasts are producing well they will become uncomfortable between 6 P.M. and 6 A.M.

I think most mothers who have had the experience of successfully breast feeding a baby and who have no occasion to be away from a baby for more than seven hours at a time would deny that breast feeding actually ties them down. In fact, they would emphasize the time saved in not having to make formula, not having to warm bottles. Those who make visits and go on vacations with the baby also speak of the convenience of not having to carry the equipment and material with which to make formula, or to find a place in which to do it.

I think that often the young woman waiting for her first baby, who says she doesn't want to be tied down by breast feeding, isn't really expecting to have to dash off on a trip with her husband, isn't really expecting to have to be away from the baby for more than six or seven hours at a time. I think what she's dreading more is the end of her freedom in general. It doesn't matter how enthusiastic she may be about the coming of a baby, she must, if she's human and sensible, have some regrets underneath. And I imagine that the picture of herself nursing the baby every four hours for months is a particularly sharp reminder of how occupied she will be.

We realize now that the emotional acceptance of a baby does not come suddenly and strongly at the moment when a woman first learns she is pregnant, but that it only grows gradually during the pregnancy and often doesn't reach full bloom until after she has begun caring for him herself at home. So a reluctance to think of breast feeding early in the pregnancy may be replaced by a positive desire in the end. If a woman remains reluctant, I think it's a mistake to urge her. Any woman or man who, under persuasion, gives up more than he feels he can afford can't help holding back in some other respect.

A woman may say that nursing a previous baby "took too much out of her," or, if this is her first, she is afraid that it will. Certainly the business of getting breast feeding started in those cases where the baby doesn't do his part well, or where the milk supply is slow to develop, can be fatiguing and nerve-racking for a couple of weeks, especially for the inexperienced and insecure mother. But once breast feeding becomes well established, there are few cases in which there is continued weight loss or other evidence of physical depletion if the mother is on a good diet. Breast feeding shouldn't take much out of a mother any more than regular exercise does. Both activities use up calories, but both also are meant to stimulate the appetite enough to make up for it. Occasionally the appetite doesn't go up enough to maintain the mother's normal weight, and this is usually due to emotional tension of some sort. In other cases, though, the weight stays up, and the impression the mother has that nursing is taking a lot out of her may be an expression of her insecurity. She may, for instance, have grown up with the conviction that there is too little of love and of the other good things of life to go around and that if one person in the family gets a lot, another must be deprived. In this sense she may feel unconsciously that the baby's gain will be her loss. If such a feeling is deep and persistent, breast feeding will foster tension and not love.

The fear of losing physical attractiveness is a very important and natural reason for many women to have doubts about breast feeding, whether they mention it or not. This fear occurs in other parts of the world, too, but probably no country puts more value on youthfulness, good figure and the maidenly bosom than we do in America. There is no need for a mother to put on a pound of extra weight during nursing. I hope that someday a scientific study is made of the effect of nursing on the shape of the breasts. I'm not at all convinced that it is as important as is commonly supposed. Certainly all breasts lose their youthful lines sooner or later, whether or not a baby has ever been nursed. And on the other hand, I have been pediatrician for a number of mothers who have nursed several babies and shown no noticeable change during those years. Perhaps the most important factor is the character of the tissues, as they vary among different individuals. Of course the breasts become enlarged during pregnancy itself, and it is probable that a good brassière plays an important role, then as well as during the nursing period, in preventing the stretching of the supporting tissues of the breast which might otherwise occur in some women.

While we're waiting for the scientific study I'm not sure that there's much we can do to remove this objection. In our kind of civilization, what would probably persuade a great number of young women to nurse would be the example of a number of queens of the stage, movies and television. They would be a lot more convincing and inspiring than the arguments of doctors, nurses and other earnest advocates. Of course there is a tremendous variation among women (and among the men they want to please) as to what beauty consists of and how important it is. It depends, too, on the circle a couple moves in, and on age. Generally speaking, we're apt to be vainest toward the end of adolescence. Then we acquire jobs and spouses and houses and children and other responsibilities, and these become increasingly our concerns and our satisfactions. The woman or man who is anxiously looking in the mirror every chance at thirty and forty and fifty is not growing up and is bound to be more disappointed every year. Don't get me wrong, though—I think everyone should make the best of his looks for his own sake as well as for those who look at him. It's only a question of which things come first. Time and style will also take some of the present emphasis off prominence of bosoms. Meanwhile, I myself would not urge a woman to nurse if she was worried about losing her appeal. That's no way to bring her and her baby together.

Occasionally a woman will be unable to conceal a look of disgust when a doctor asks her if she plans to nurse, and she will say that she couldn't possibly do it, "it would make me feel like an animal." This reaction is not anything she chose to acquire herself. It is likely that her parents were inhibited people and that, whether they meant to or not, they communicated to her their feelings of revulsion about various bodily functions—excretion, sex, nursing, sometimes even about eating—which gradually transformed the potential enjoyment of these activities into displeasure. Most mothers who nurse successfully can tell you that breast feeding is physically pleasurable and this helps to build the love and harmony between them and their babies. (Unfortunately, this often isn't so in the first few days of nursing, when the sensitivity of the nipples and of the healing uterus may make the start of each nursing distinctly uncomfortable.) But in those cases

F.D.R. WANTED GEORGE VI TO GIVE HONG KONG TO CHINA

"It seemed to me the President used conversation as others used a first draft on paper. It is a method of trying out an idea."

By LORD Halifax

CONCLUSION I cannot begin to write anything about our time in America without a lively feeling of gratitude to Providence, operating through Churchill, for having put it in my way to have an experience that has been and will remain quite unforgettable. When we went to the United States in January, 1941, following the death of Lord Lothian in December, 1940, we were going to a strange people and a strange land. When we came away in May, 1946, we felt that we were saying good-by to friends, with whom events had forged links no time or circumstance could break.

Lothian had occupied an exceptional position in the United States, and it was not easy for anyone to succeed him. Various suggestions had been made, and finally the Prime Minister in the following letter had thrown out the idea of my going myself:

My dear Edward: Before proceeding further about the American vacancy I should like to know whether you yourself would care to undertake this high and perilous charge. I feel I ought to put this question to you before considering lesser alternatives. In doing so let me assure you that I am in close personal accord and sympathy with you, that I value and admire your work at the Foreign Office and wish for its continuance, and that only the vital issues now open between us and the United States, on which our whole future depends, induce me even to contemplate the loss and disturbance which a change in your sphere of action would cause to the Cabinet.

Yours ever,

WINSTON S. CHURCHILL

I told him all the things that seemed to me to weigh against this idea, for I naturally did not want to leave London while things were as they were, but said that in the last resort he must of course feel free to decide what he thought best in the public interest. This brought the following, which was obviously bound to be conclusive:

My dear Edward: Your public spirit has prompted you to leave yourself in my hands in the matter of this great appointment.

I have no doubt whatever that the National interest will be best served at this juncture by your becoming our Ambassador to the United States. If you thought well to have Sir Gerald Campbell made Minister, you would be relieved of some of the pressure, and it would be possible for you to come back here for periodic visits. On such occasions I should wish you immediately to resume your position as a Member of the War Cabinet and sit with us for all purposes.

The business we now have with the United States can only be handled by one who knows the whole policy of the Government and is in constant direct relation with us. If New York and Washington were as near as Paris used to be, all important affairs would be transacted by personal meetings between Prime Ministers and Foreign Secretaries on both sides. The Atlantic requires that this intimacy should be achieved by other processes, and you are, I am sure, the one person best qualified for this paramount duty.

Yours ever,

WINSTON S. CHURCHILL

The Prime Minister came with us to see us off, combining with that a visit to the fleet, for which he had invited Mr. Harry Hopkins, recently arrived in England as the President's personal representative, to join his party. The business of getting to the battleship was complicated by the necessity of effecting a double transfer: from a mine sweeper in which we set off from Thurso to a destroyer, and from the destroyer to the battleship. And each change was a perilous proceeding, with the little ships jumping about in the swell, and every part of the deck treacherous with a covering of powdered snow above a coat of ice.

Harry Hopkins made a good story when he got back to the States about his adventures, which he delighted to tell. According to this, the President's personal representative (who had perhaps not been so agile as he might have been and was in imminent danger of falling into the sea) had been caught by the collar in the vise-like grip of a British sailor, and unceremoniously hauled to safety on the deck of the destroyer, to which the Prime Minister had more skillfully made the transit just before. He therefore was able to watch the whole proceeding with mild enjoyment, leaning over the rail and smoking a large cigar. "And the only observation he made as I landed at his feet like a great fish," Harry used to say, "was 'Do you know, Harry, it took me two years to persuade the Admiralty to armor-plate these decks?'" However, all was finally in order and soon the time came to be saying good-by, the shore party left, we slowly got under way and began our journey across the Atlantic.

All the way across we hoped for some diversionary signal that might put us on the track of a German raider, but nothing of that sort happened, and we duly moved up Chesapeake Bay to Annapolis, to be welcomed there in person by the President. He had intended to come on board and inspect the King George V, which was the last thing in naval construction, but it was a wet afternoon and this program was canceled. Instead, he made the circuit of the ship in his launch, receiving the appropriate compliments, after which we were taken off to his yacht. I had never CONTINUED ON PAGE 34

Entertaining ideas for March

by Betty Crocker

Lion or lamb? Unpredictable March is with us again. But with traditional luck, it'll be a glorious day for the wearing of the green! And you'll want something just as bright and gay to serve at home. A great big Marble Cake, perhaps, dotted with good-luck shamrocks. And for the children, Leprechaun Cupcakes—with smiling faces and jaunty green hats.

Feel like jumping the season? Why not? These first warm days always make me wish for ice-cold lemonade served with slices of our Confetti Angel Food—as multi-colored as the first spring flowers.

But when March winds blow—you'll be thankful for a last roaring fire. Invite friends over to share your hearth and serve squares of Checkerboard Cake and steaming cups of coffee. Or bake up a big batch of brownies, when rain keeps the family glued to the TV set.

The weather may be guesswork—but you can always depend on a melt-in-your-mouth-perfect cake, when you use our Betty Crocker Cake Mixes. Each one starts with a real home recipe. And we use the finest ingredients, like Softasilk Cake Flour and high-quality shortening. You add fresh eggs for homemade flavor. Wouldn't a cake taste good this very night?

seen him before, but after being welcomed at the gangway by Frank Knox, the Secretary of the Navy, and the President's aide, General Watson, we were taken into the little dining saloon, where the President was seated at the table. In one moment he had put us completely at our ease, and we were chattering away as if we had known each other all our lives. With complete absence of any official punctilio, he said that he did not want me to pay any formal visit for the purpose of presenting my Letters of Credence, and I could bring them down the first time I came to see him. After a good dinner, the President drove us to the embassy in Washington, to sleep our first night in the United States.

The President had made the gesture of thus meeting the British ambassador, and had emphasized the informality of the relations he desired to be established in order to leave no doubt in any quarter of where his Administration stood. It was, indeed, to Roosevelt's lasting honor that he had grasped the nature of the Nazi challenge to the world as long ago as October, 1937, when he made his famous "Quarantine" speech in Chicago; and though administrative action might still be hampered by neutrality acts and the like, he would be steadily leading his public opinion to understand what this struggle, although the British Commonwealth stood alone in it from June, 1940, to June, 1941, involved for free men everywhere.

To one like myself, unfamiliar with both the American Constitution and the currents of American politics, there was room for misunderstanding the position of the President. In British eyes he doubled the parts of sovereign and Prime Minister, and it was natural to think of him in either role at such a time as the accepted representative of the whole American people. So in one sense, he was, but not in the sense in which I had pictured him as the acknowledged and respected standard-bearer, opposed indeed by the Republican Party in domestic policy, but truly, with domestic controversy laid aside in war, the champion of the whole country in the international sphere.

The democratic American idea is, not that every man shall be on a level with every other, but that everyone shall have liberty, without hindrance, to be what God made him.

HENRY WARD BEECHER

Imagine my surprise when soon after reaching Washington I found myself the guest at dinner of a Republican group of thirty or forty congressmen. At such parties it was the custom for the guest of the evening to make a very short speech, after which every congressman round the table asked him a question. About the fourth congressman to speak said this: "Mr. Ambassador, before I ask my question, I would like you to know that every one of us in this room thinks President Roosevelt is as dangerous a dictator as Hitler or Mussolini, and that he is taking this country to hell just as fast as he can."

Few British persons who have not been in the United States realize how completely the American Constitution differs from our own. Bryce made a full examination of it, and I have no doubt that Americans have derived as much profit as outsiders from careful study of his work. If one had to generalize—though nearly all generalizations are liable to mislead—one could say that the American Constitution rested on statute and the British on convention—not completely true, but useful as a rough guide in the approach to closer study.

In another respect, for reasons familiar to all students of history, the American Constitution is much more diffuse in its distribution of power than is the British. If an American comes to London and says that he would like to see the British Government, his British guide will assure him that nothing is more simple. At a crowded question time in the House of Commons, he will show him most of the Government, sitting on the Front Bench, and can then take him across the lobby to the House of Lords and show him some more. There may be one or two absentees, but he will have seen Her Majesty's Government in whose hands, so long as they enjoy the support of the House of Commons, effective power resides.

But let the position be reversed, and a British visitor to Washington evince a similar desire to see the United States Government. His American guide will no doubt first show him the President in the White House and explain how great in some respects is his personal power, and yet how closely in others he is dependent upon Congress. Then he would be shown the several members of the Administration, appointed by the President, and responsible to him—Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of Defense, and others. Next the guide will take him up to Congress, and point out to him the majority leaders in either house, with chairmen of important committees, and direct his attention to the special powers of the Senate in the field of treaty making, and so on.

Yet the visitor will not have finished, for his mentor will still have to impress upon him the duty and the rights of the Supreme Court, as interpreter and protector of the Constitution, so that unless the Constitution is formally amended, which is a long process, the powers of Congress are rigidly confined within it—unlike these of Parliament, which the old lawyers were accustomed to say was omnipotent, except that it could not make a man a woman or a woman a man.

This contrast between a rigid and a flexible constitution is not easy for Americans to evaluate. I remember we were crossing the Atlantic in 1945 during the general election, of which wireless reports were coming in. An American fellow passenger asked me one night what I thought about it, and I told him that it looked much like a considerable Labour landslide. As this appeared to depress him, I added that I did not think he need have anything to worry about. We should no doubt have a lot of internal argument, and should from time to time get very cross with each other, but we were well accustomed to that sort of thing and did not allow it to disturb us unduly. As regards all foreign affairs, I had no doubt that Ernest Bevin would continue substantially the same policy as had been followed by Eden in Churchill's Government.

On this he reflected a moment, and then said, "Then you think the change-over will be orderly?" And I recalled an observation made to me by a wise American to the effect that he did not think it would have been safe to entrust a completely flexible constitution, like the British, to the hands of a people so sensitive and mercurial as the Americans.

Comparisons and contrasts give food for thought. The President, for example, is chosen by direct vote of all qualified citizens, but once he has been elected and installed, he is there for four years and liable to no popular power of dismissal. In emergencies he has wide authority to act, but for the carrying through of most of his ordinary policy he must look to Congress, which may easily have a majority not of his party. The British Prime Minister may be dismissed overnight by a vote of the House of Commons, but so long as he enjoys their support there is nothing which it is not in his power to do.

The American President need never have held executive or elective office of any sort before being chosen by the nation to fill that highest of all posts. The British Prime Minister comes to his high office only after years of severe test and public examination, as a member of Parliament and minister, and depends both upon the general appraisement of him over a long period of time by the country and also upon the opinion, much more intimate, of those of his own party on whom he must rely for help as colleagues in government.

To one who looks on, the American people take an appalling risk in this latitude of choice they now hold in their hands, for one would suppose that circumstances might easily bring to the White House a presidential candidate whose only qualifications were the gifts of demagogic appeal. Yet the world must hope that the American answer to such an imaginary threat may be the right one: that ever since the presidential election has depended upon a direct vote, this danger has not in fact materialized, and that the popular instinct can be relied upon to prevent it.

As one gradually settled into the work, it became evident that the ambassador's duty in wartime—and I dare say it is not very different now—consisted of three main elements. He had to keep in touch with all the different components of the Government in Washington, in order to help the two-way traffic of thought between Washington and London; he had to keep himself au fait with the work of the several British missions and be ready to give them any help in his power; and lastly he had to get out of Washington as much as he could into a country the size of a continent, in order to get the British point of view across and clear up avoidable misunderstandings of it.

Of these different sides of his duty, the first was apt to be the most difficult, for the British and American approach to a problem is generally different. If it was a question of making a joint statement on policy, as was from time to time suggested, there might be produced an American draft, rich in assertion of principle and warm in its promise of happy issue. When such a draft got to London it would be subjected to close and critical examination. In due course it would get back to Washington, much more watertight no doubt against possible questions, but with much of the original warmth gone from it. The duty of translation of one thought into terms of the other, therefore, was seldom easy.

From this point of view of keeping in touch with the Administration, there was nothing more important than keeping in touch with the President. F.D.R. made my task easy. If I had not seen him for some time, I would ring up General Watson, whom everybody loved and knew as Pa, and say that if the President was not too busy, I would much like a chance of having ten minutes with him; I had no particular business and would readily understand if his engagement list was too uncomfortably full.

This nearly always meant that the President asked me to go down to the White House and have luncheon with him informally, each eating off a corner of his desk. One of the greatest of his gifts was the power that he had of putting any visitor immediately and completely at his ease. Conversation ranged widely, and ran on without the least inhibition of ceremonious restraint. He would deal with any subject that came up, and once satisfied that his confidence would be respected would discuss freely.

The interest to me of watching the play and movement of his thought never failed. His mind was not at all confined to any beaten track, but both by nature and choice enjoyed the liberty of exploration. The result was talk always original, never dull, flowing this way or that as the argument or the fancy of the moment dictated, with appearance of complete spontaneity even if the speaker might perhaps have more than half an eye on the impression that it was producing on his listener. It may be supposed that I used to get great enjoyment out of these unofficial contacts he was good enough to allow.

One day, raising a subject that was to come into more serious prominence in a later connection, he said to me, "Is Hong Kong a Crown colony?" and when I said it was, he went on to ask whether that meant it was a personal possession of the King. I told him that it was not perhaps quite so simple as that, but that it was generally the case that Crown colonies were not self-governing and were very much more under the control of Whitehall.

After a little more such constitutional exchange, the President said he had had an idea about Hong Kong, on which he would like my opinion. At the present time it was likely to become more and more of a political headache for us; China was bound to get more restive about it, American opinion thought it was just a survival of the bad old imperialism, and it would be a good thing all round if we could find some means of taking the sting out of it. His idea was this: Let the King send a telegram to Chiang Kai-shek, saying how impressed he had been with the Chinese resistance to the Japanese aggressors over many years, and that to mark his admiration of Chinese resistance, he wished to present his Crown colony of Hong Kong to China as a free gift in perpetuity. To this Chiang Kai-shek would reply by telegram, recording his deep gratitude and emotion at the wonderful thought and saying that in order to give these practical expression he proposed, while accepting the gift in the name of China, to order the following procedure. Each sunrise and sunset the British flag would be hoisted and lowered with due solemnity and saluted by Chinese troops; existing British business would be guaranteed its accustomed rights and position under law; and the port of Hong Kong would remain for all time a free port for the commerce of all nations. If this were done, the President thought, no one would ever find out any difference in daily life, but "it would take care of the question for seventy years." What did I think?

I said it was very ingenious, and I agreed that life would presumably continue under his plan with little or no outward change. But Chiang Kai-shek would not be there forever, and you could not count upon anyone who might come after him, either amicably or in hostility, taking the same view.

That sort of contribution made conversation with F.D.R. entertaining. A queer incident, of which I was told, recalled this talk to my mind soon after the President's death. This is my diary entry for April 17, 1945:

I heard a day or two ago, on very direct authority, the following, for which I do not quote any names because I was told not to, but the evidence for it is very good. A short time before he died, someone had been sent for to see President Roosevelt, to discuss some question of production. He told another visitor afterwards of his concern, that when he went in, the President was sitting, staring into space and apparently completely absorbed in his own thoughts. He only spoke three times (not to the visitor, but as if to himself)—"If Churchill insists on Hong Kong, I will have to take it to the King." This was repeated three times and the man then left and told the secretary in the outer office that he would come again some other time when the President had less on his mind. The person who transmitted it to me says, "Stories like this always come up afterwards, but this seemed to come so straight, I thought you would be interested." It certainly is interesting.

Five days earlier than the date of this diary note, on April 12, 1945, which was a Thursday, I had gone to have tea with Stimson and we were sitting talking in the garden, when at twenty minutes to six his telephone rang. He went off to answer it and came back saying that he was summoned to a meeting at the White House at six o'clock. He had no notion what the meeting was about, but much feared that it might be bad news about the President.

As my car was at the door, I drove him down, going back myself to the Embassy after dropping him. There I heard the news, which was already on the ticker, of the President's having died at 3:35 that afternoon. It seemed strange that if he had died at 3:35, Stimson should not have known it by 5:45; but they had, I suppose, to tell Mrs. Roosevelt first and she happened to be at a meeting in Washington, so that it may have taken a little time to get hold of her. I rang up Harry Hopkins, who told me the President had been quite "gay" at luncheon, had afterward signed his letters, and was sitting for his portrait when he had some sort of fainting fit, and never recovered consciousness, dying an hour and a half later.

Thought raced as one tried to adjust one's mind to this stark fact of death. I could not say I was altogether surprised, for I had been greatly shocked by his appearance when I had seen him ten days before with Oliver Lyttelton, who had formed an even worse impression of him than I had. But the timing of it could hardly have been more dramatic or more melancholy, at the very moment that the troops of which the President was the constitutional commander in chief were on the point of entering the principal enemy capital. With that reflection went the thought of how heavy a blow this would be for Churchill, who had set so great store by his intimate friendship, and counted so much upon it, and how acutely he must feel the loss of his war comrade.

I managed after various attempts to get through to him on the telephone, and found as I expected that his first impulse was to come over himself to attend the funeral. I was, however, able to assure him that, though all those concerned were profoundly touched by his thought, they nonetheless hoped he would spare himself so great an exertion. With this counsel, after a good deal of argument, he finally concurred and Eden came in his place to represent the British Government.

People used to talk about F.D.R.'s charm and he certainly had that quality or power in rare degree. But it was much more than the kind of superficial facility that seems to get many people over the rough places of human contacts. He was genuinely interested in human beings as human beings; problems stood before his mind's eye always as human situations; the treatment of them spelled greater happiness or greater unhappiness for men and women; and all the time it was on the relations of men with men that the wheels of the world turned.

This natural endowment of sympathy was half the secret of his particular hold upon his countrymen's affections and made his so-called "fireside chats" on the wireless so true to their name. It was part of his genius that he managed to give these speeches the guise of a friendly conversation, in which people could almost feel themselves to be sharing, as the speaker dealt easily with the various points the argument suggested to the listener as he went along. People liked to hear him talking about their own doubts and objections, and such degree of enjoyment of the informal presentment of a case carried them a long way toward acceptance of the policy it was meant to serve.

Baldwin had a good deal of the same power, which I suspect is more potent than eloquence, and it is one of the new techniques which modern science has developed. It was this sense of sympathy, too, that gave Roosevelt an intuition into what those around him were thinking, which very often helped him to get past obstructive reserves and reach a footing of closer intellectual accord.

I was often astonished that, having this capacity as he had, he should have seemed to make comparatively so little use of it with hostile members of Congress. I would have

EATABANANA!

Bananas . . . wholesome—and then some!

Tropic salad. New way to add subtle flavor and texture to green salad — slice in banana just before you add dressing and toss it. It's the kind of trick that can make a hostess famous!

Banana toast. Good morning idea: slice a banana on toasted bread, then sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon, dot with butter, brown a few minutes in your broiler. Serve with honey. Luscious!

I'm Chiquita Banana and I'm here to sing
That you should eat more bananas —
They've got everything!
They give you vitamins, minerals
And energy, too —
Bananas taste so good
And are so good for you!
You can put 'em in a milkshake,
In a salad or a pie—aye!
And bananas make a nice team
With a cereal or ice cream.
Every member of the family loves bananas
Every single way you try 'em —
They are so nourishing and tasty —
So hurry up and buy 'em!

To be sung to the tune of Chiquita Banana supposed that if he had invited selected individuals to the White House and talked very frankly and confidentially, the matter would not of course have remained confidential, but the edge of the opposition would almost assuredly have been blunted. On many occasions, as it seemed to me looking on, he could have smoothed the path of the Administration in this fashion very easily. But he did not, and I came therefore to the conclusion that my diagnosis was probably wrong.

And there was indeed something, intangible but not the less real, to set off on the other side. During many talks I found myself forming an impression about him which has gradually taken firm root in my mind. One day we had been chatting away about something or other, when the President suddenly said that he thought after the war we ought to do this or that about some French colony. What did I think of his idea?

I said that I scarcely saw how he could reconcile it with various pledges he had given to General Giraud or General de Gaulle. That he thought was all right. Had I any other objection? I said that I still did not like it, for there was nothing to prevent him waking up one morning and having a similar brain wave about a British colony, and we shouldn't like that at all.

At that the President laughed and said that our case was quite different. But I never heard any more of the original idea—and it seemed to me that the President was one of the people who used conversation as others of us use a first draft on paper. Whether by conversation or on paper, it is a method of trying out an idea. If it does not go well, you can modify it or drop it as you will. Nobody thinks anything of it if you do this with a paper draft; but if you do it with conversation, people say that you have changed your mind, that "you never know where you have him," and so on. All that one so often heard said about F.D.R., much of it completely unjust, may be traceable to the reason I suggest.

After the President, the most important person from the point of view of the ambassador was the Secretary of State. Cordell Hull was Secretary of State when I arrived, and it was with him that I had most to do. I had not met him before I went to America, and I remember well the first official call I paid upon him in the State Department. He spoke with great frankness about everything that was involved in Hitler's challenge to world freedom, and was eager to hear everything that I could tell him of how things looked and how people were feeling in England. That was in January, 1941; the Battle of Britain was over and the great German bid for mastery of the air had been held. But the menace of invasion, suspended as it might be during the months of bad winter weather, was still there, and Mr. Hull certainly had no illusions about the ugly possibilities the future might hold.

From that time on, I naturally saw him often to discuss the many matters of concern to our two countries. He was always generous of his time and I greatly enjoyed our contacts. The first impression on meeting him was apt to be misleading. His eyes seemed often to be looking out upon the middle or far distance, whether past or future one could not tell; the features of his face, distinguished and sharply cut, were those of someone who had seen many sides of life and had learned both the need and the power of patience. But let a word or some train of thought strike the spark, and the whole man would, as it were, spring to arms in support or condemnation. It was common knowledge that Mr. Hull's command of his home-state vernacular was wide and formidable. I have heard some of it—not, happily, directed at myself; the Japanese envoys with whom he was later to be negotiating up to the moment of Pearl Harbor heard a great deal, if Mr. Hull's report to me of his own language an hour later was even a pale image of what had actually passed.

No one was more alive to moral issues and their impact upon policy. But he would refuse to allow himself to be pushed off a well-considered line of action by false sentiment. Thus for him there was nothing either in morals or anything else that need oblige the Allies to instruct General Eisenhower to treat Darlan as untouchable, after we had gone into North Africa in November, 1942. If Darlan was prepared to take action that would save precious American lives, it would be criminal folly to refuse it. So his comment on that situation when it arose was, as usual, pungent: "If I am in a bloody fight with a dangerous desperado, and the worst ex-convict in the world comes along and offers to help me, I don't make him head of the Sunday school but I don't refuse his help."

Experience was pleasantly varied. Once on the way back to Washington from giving a talk to the Governors' Conference at Asheville, I was the recipient of what may be called an uncovenanted reward. I was reading in my compartment on the train and a young college boy, as I guessed him to be, came down the train selling papers and magazines which he invited me to buy. I was rather deep in my book and therefore told him that I was sure all his magazines were interesting, but that I got little time for reading and I did want to finish my book before we got back to Washington; if he did not mind, therefore, I would not buy any of his magazines. He then asked me whether I was not the British ambassador, and this being cleared up, he said he would like to talk a little about reading. Which we did: what was and what was not worth reading. At the end of our talk, he said that he had enjoyed it very much, and that to mark this he would like to give me something by which he set a good deal of store. With this he unpinned from his coat and pinned onto mine a badge on which was inscribed "MacArthur for President." It was just at the moment that the agitation in this sense was active, and I recalled with some apprehension how one of my predecessors had been relieved of his post for alleged interference in a presidential election. But I could not hurt my friend's feelings, and therefore had to accept his badge, taking as much care as I could that nobody else saw it being worn by the British ambassador.

Life in Washington was varied by periodic engagements in New York, which to me always made great appeal. The scale of its huge buildings never ceased to impress the imagination; there was no place like the Natural History Museum, if one had an hour or two to spare; and the satisfaction to be had from a walk round the Metropolitan Museum and the incomparable little Frick Museum was assured. From the first, New York was to be for us a place of many good meetings, and its political contacts were often a valuable supplement to those of Washington.

We left the United States in May, 1946, after spending almost exactly five and a half years at the Embassy. As we came away from New York I went up on deck at 6 A.M. to see the last of that wonderful sky line and to salute the Statue of Liberty. It had been an education and a privilege to be in the United States at such a time, and as the ship moved eastward one was conscious both of the keen pleasure with which one looked forward to returning home and of the real sorrow with which one bade farewell to the United States.

Churchill had suggested after we got back that I should join the opposition shadow cabinet, with the prospect, as I supposed, of returning to some office in government if and when the Conservatives found themselves in power. As, however, for the last year of my time in Washington I had been the servant of a Labour administration under Ernest Bevin as Foreign Secretary, I felt it would be hardly right to jump immediately into party politics. I also wanted after the disturbance of the war to get my own affairs into some sort of order under the new conditions that had to be met. Having, moreover, been ten years out of England in India and the United States, and the best part of all the other years after the first war in London, I felt entitled to spend as much of the rest of my life as I might at home.

The first taste of emancipation was sweet. Living at home in comparative freedom from external obligations was a pleasing variant of what for a long time had been the layout of my life. The only sadness has been that steady loss of friends and companions, which comes to us all as we get older, and the death of the King in 1952 while still quite young was a sharp sorrow of these years. He had always shown us great consideration and kindness, and I had been privileged to see a good deal of him up to the time of our going to Washington. While we were serving there and coming home each summer, the King and Queen always made a point of giving us the opportunity of reporting personally to them on persons and events in the United States. Few people were endowed with judgment more wise or more penetrating that his, rooted in simple and assured standards and frequently salted with humor uninhibited and robust. As his death, sudden and at the particular moment of its occurrence unexpected, threw the commonwealth into mourning, there was no difference of feeling in any quarter.

The recollection of the bleak inauguration of his reign fifteen years earlier, the grief now universal: the loyal devotion to be so fervently expressed at the coronation of the young Queen, and ready to do anything in its power to lighten the load now laid upon her: these concurrent emotions, joined to the volume of sympathy that went out to Queen Elizabeth, told how great a work with her help the King had accomplished in the re-establishment of the monarchy, after the strain placed upon it by the events that brought him to the throne. It is not indeed easy to overstate the effect of their influence and example.

I am always happy to get back to Garrowby, where our life is now centered. We have been able to keep the house open much on its old footing, mainly through the support of two faithful helpers—our housekeeper, Miss Gaywood, who was nurse to our children, and Harry Salkeld, our chauffeur, who was born and bred at Hickleton and came to me when I got my first car more than fifty years ago.

I have found plenty to occupy me, farming and looking after the estate. The latter under postwar conditions is not free from difficulty and takes more time than I would have expected. For the expenses of administration and maintenance have steadily risen, outstripping agricultural rents, which in spite of recent increases still lag behind. New types of farming bring to the landowner successive requests for capital improvements, living standards are steadily rising, and the young generation is not generally satisfied with what seemed tolerable to their parents forty years ago.

Although Garrowby is now our main base, we keep touch with Hickleton, and as Hickleton played a large part in my life when it began, it retains its place, withal different, now. During the war the house had been requisitioned by the army immediately after Dunkirk and for some time had been General Alexander's headquarters. Later the garden had provided a large camp, first for German prisoners and then for displaced persons. When we regained possession of the house, we quickly found, both from the point of view of finance and from the difficulty of securing adequate staff, that it was not likely to be feasible to maintain it. There was no alternative but to hand it over for some other purpose, and we were fortunate in being able to give it to an Anglican sisterhood, the Society of the Holy Paraclete, for use as one of their schools.

The property remained in our hands, and in order to maintain connection with this part of Yorkshire we converted part of the stables into a small cottage where we are comfortably lodged whenever we want to go there. Our old home is now well established in its new role, and I have been reconciled to this necessity by the thought of how greatly the establishment of such a school might buttress the future welfare of the parish church, and of much else that my father would have been concerned to secure.

S S S S S

In this world, one must be a little too kind to be kind enough.
MARIVAUX

S S S S S

Within twelve months of our return from the United States and with great and enduring profit to himself and us, our youngest son, who had been badly wounded in the desert with the Eighth Army, enlarged the family circle by marrying Diana Kellett, whose father had been killed in North Africa in 1943. So fortified and supported, he has gone into Parliament, finding the House of Commons, I am afraid, in these days of slender majorities and close margins a more exacting taskmaster than it was to me. It has thus been our great good fortune to see our three children happily married and to watch their children coming forward to take their part in the continuing family procession. It is a singular element in this good fortune that these new foundations of family life should be established very close to our own home at Garrowby. So may we of the older generation feel that the Yorkshire soil is being spread over the family roots, which will draw virtue from the spreading.

Here this story, such as it has been, must close; for the content of any time that may still remain to me is not likely to be of interest to anybody beyond myself and a very intimate circle. Certainly the thought that dominates all others, as the moving picture of seventy years travels across the screen, is one of great thankfulness to both God and man. My thanks go to Him for the home into which it was my privilege to be born; for the early knowledge of Him to which this home brought me; and for the countless opportunities He has given me—alas! how sadly misused—of making this knowledge my invariable guide and counselor; for the manifold blessings of life and health, and enjoyment of many of the world's best things.

I am thankful, also, for those whose relationship and friendship have stood to me for so much through the years: for my father and mother to whom I have made constant reference, and whose good gifts to me from childhood were above any other; for my wife without whom little or nothing that may ever have appeared deserving of recognition in my life would have been achieved; for our children; and for many friends in many countries. We owe more to our friends than we generally acknowledge or remember. END

"Having John home every day isn't nearly as hard as I thought it would be."

Writers apparently never have to "retire." They can go on and on, unlike the bankers and executives, the factory workers and the white-collar men, all of whom have to make do, after 65, with hobbies or gardens or Florida. Or like the retired Lancashire plowman, with odd jobs about the farmyard, who, when asked how he liked his new work, said, "I feels like one o' they nuts on me ole plow. Keeps on goin' roun' an' roun' an' gettin' nowhere. Nowt to bite on." (The Countryman)

Bertrand Russell has plenty to bite on in his old age—mathematician, philosopher, author of PORTRAITS FROM MEMORY (Simon & Schuster). Russell is now 85. George Bernard Shaw (who somehow gives the impression of being still alive!) would be 100.

For a time the two were great friends. In his book Russell tells about one Sunday in their youth when Shaw nearly met his end. They were bicycling, and Shaw, just learning to ride, ran into Russell with such force that he (Shaw) was hurled through the air and landed on his back twenty feet away. Actually he was unhurt, got up and continued to ride. But poor Russell's machine was shattered and he had to go home by train. It was a very slow train, and at every station Shaw with his bicycle appeared on the platform, put his head into the carriage and jeered.

In A CHANCE FOR GLORY (Holt) Constance Wright enlarges on a footnote in history—a short episode in the long life of Lafayette, and one that in later years he himself deliberately played down.

Her lively account concerns the five years when he was prisoner in Olmutz, Austria, and the attempts of a young German adventurer, Bollmann, to effect his escape. It is thoroughly documented history and full of surprises. It's amusing and quite a thriller, what with the actual escape, the chase and the ignominious capture. In company with the rather nervy Bollmann, we see Paris, London, Vienna, even George and Martha Washington, cozily at tea, in Mount Vernon, annoyed no end by too many visitors, and not the least by the ubiquitous Bollmann.

A PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN INDIAN, by Oliver La Farge, is sure to be a revelation to the many of us who don't know about the Indians of our own continent; a "must," I'd say, for curious Americans.

La Farge has devoted his life to the Indians, and writes about them simply, clearly and with great knowledge. He starts thousands of years back with the earliest migrations from the tip of Siberia, goes through the centuries of roaming tribes, the evolution of civilization, the coming of the white man with its subsequent tragedies, and up to the present. Illustrated by 350 pictures, old photos, color reproductions. (Crown Publishers, $7.50, and worth every cent of it!)

The wild stretches of the American continent always bring to mind the explorer in the impenetrable forest who came upon a mighty oak upon which were carved the words: "I was the first person to travel through these wilds. Daniel Boone." Directly underneath, however, was another inscription: "That's what you think! Eleanor Roosevelt."

Gilbert Highet's latest book, POETS IN A LANDSCAPE (Knopf), is contemplation of the countryside of Italy, the hills and villages and the byways of cities where his favorite Latin poets used to wander—Catullus, Ovid, Horace, Vergil, Juvenal. He wandered there himself last summer, and through his own impressions, and the words of the poets themselves, a far-away long-ago day rises out of the mist.

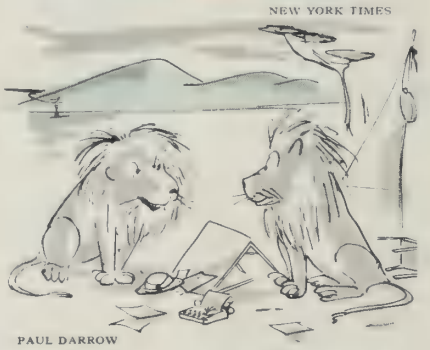
All the books listed below are books I have liked but haven't had quite space enough to enlarge upon. Some are brand new, others a few months old.

Two idyllic books about boyhood: THE LORD'S OYSTERS, by Gilbert Byron (Little, Brown), about a lazy, sunny, sometimes highly dramatic life on the shores of Chesapeake Bay around 1910. . . . THE RAIN AND THE FIRE AND THE WILL OF GOD, by Donald Wetzel (Random House), a tender book about a boy on an Alabama hill, his family, another boy from the North, guitar playing, swimming, adolescent love. And what a title!



THE TALL CAPTAINS, a good historical novel by Bart Spicer (Dodd, Mead) about the French Empire in Canada under Montcalm, defended and lost on the Plains of Abraham.

THE SILENT TRAVELLER IN PARIS (Norton), by Chiang Yee, the Chinese painter who looks with such a bright Oriental eye on the Western world, and pictures it so beautifully both in words and delicate pastel paintings.

GUERILLA SURGEON, by Lindsay Rogers (Doubleday)—the stirring experiences of a New Zealand doctor who volunteered to work with the Yugoslav Partisans, 1943–45; the desperate stand against the Germans in the mountains under a little-known but gallant leader who called himself Tito; a hair-raising account of savage fighting and absolute discipline, of a hospital constantly moving under fire, of a people selfless in their patriotism and dauntlessly courageous.

KNOW YOUR HEIRLOOMS (McBride), a useful handbook, fully illustrated, for those who don't know them. By Thomas Ormsbee, a specialist in antiques, and author of two Field Guides—to Early American Furniture and to American Victorian Furniture.

Two unusually good mysteries: KNOCK AND WAIT A WHILE, by William Rawle Weeks (Houghton, Mifflin), a spy story about an American operator on the trail of a popular young woman journalist in Europe. She is being lured into Russia. . . . THE MEGSTONE PLOT, by Andrew Garve, in which the reader is in on the

VOLUNTEERS MEET CHILDREN AT PLANE ...Seattle, Washington

Open arms await a tiny Korean orphan alighting from a plane at Seattle. Her new home in the Midwest still 1000 miles away, she will stop overnight with the Rev. and Mrs. Edwin H. Weibel, Travelers Aid volunteers.

Beacon for Air Travelers

By MARGARET HICKEY

The familiar blue-and-white lamp of the Travelers Aid Society now shines in a number of the nation's big airports—a beacon light to those in distress. With air travel increasing every year, personal service given by airlines is necessarily reduced. And Travelers Aid is stepping in to help with this brand-new service.

For many newcomers from foreign lands, the Travelers Aid volunteer is their first contact on American soil. Picture a young German boy arriving alone at San Francisco's International Airport. No one is there to meet him. He has never heard of the Travelers Aid Society, but a volunteer waiting at the ramp to assist anyone who may need help notices his bewilderment. He doesn't speak English, but the volunteer knows someone on the airport staff who speaks German—and soon the boy is in touch with his sponsor and on his way.

If anyone doubts that the San Francisco International Airport lives up to its name, check the roster of linguists at the Travelers Aid desk. The volunteer worker on duty may not speak the language herself, but within minutes she will be in touch with someone who does. In the airport itself she may call on a reservations clerk who speaks Japanese; a porter who knows four languages; or a waitress who speaks Finnish. Or she may telephone any of approximately 100 people—consuls, business and professional people—who have offered to assist with "telephone translations."

Los Angeles Travelers Aid pioneered airport service in 1950. The Chicago Society followed suit at Midway Airport in 1952. In 1954 the New York Society, with a special grant from the Puerto Rican government, stationed two workers at Idlewild, primarily to assist incoming Puerto Ricans. Since then a local foundation has awarded a grant to pay for a third worker, which makes possible service from 8 A.M. to 10 P.M. A volunteer program will be under way shortly.

In Denver, the Junior League financed the first full year of operation, beginning October, 1955, at Stapleton Field, and extended partial funds for the second and third years, the balance provided by the Community Chest. Junior League volunteers staff the booth.

Other airports with Travelers Aid desks are Boston, Atlanta, Cleveland; Columbus, Georgia; Tulsa, Oklahoma. END

EIGHT-YEAR-OLD JOHNNY BEAVER ARRIVING 4:20 P.M. PLEASE MEET AT AIRPORT.

It is four o'clock on a Thursday afternoon when that message from Anchorage, Alaska, arrives at Travelers Aid in Seattle, Washington. There is no Travelers Aid booth at the airport, and headquarters is at least a half hour by car from the field. But twenty minutes later when the plane lands, Shirley Kangas, a trim brunette wearing a blue arm band, is standing at the passenger gate waiting to greet the young Alaskan.

Shirley Kangas, who has two children of her own, is a member of the Women's Guild airport committee of McMicken Heights Lutheran Church, and on call twenty-four hours a day. ("Well, not quite—we've never been called after two A.M. or before five A.M.," she admits.) But since the church—and the homes of its members—is only a half mile from the airport, volunteer Shirley Kangas can answer an emergency telephone request from downtown in a matter of minutes.

Johnny Beaver, an Eskimo, is dressed like any other eight-year-old in a leather jacket and tan trousers, but his chubby face and dark eyes are stolid. "You have nearly six hours before your next flight; how about dinner at my house?" Shirley asks. Johnny only clutches the string of his big cardboard box more tightly.

Even if he doesn't understand English, he'll know what to do with an ice-cream cone, Shirley decides, and propels him toward the coffee shop. Johnny's solemn gaze wanders about the huge airport building. Seated at a window table, he reaches out to touch the pane of glass, then looks at Shirley as if to ask if there is really something between him and the outside world. But his attention is at once diverted by the arrival of ice cream. Johnny takes his first taste, then a second—and suddenly opens up into a wide, creamy-mustached grin.

To any of the twelve members of the Guild's airport committee, that grin is worth the price of 100 ice-cream cones. Many of the children they meet at the request of the Seattle Travelers Aid Society are frightened and lonely Eskimo or Indian children traveling to foster homes or medical-treatment centers in the States; some are tiny Korean or Japanese orphans, en route to adoptive parents in this country, and often terrified at flying for the first time. One orphan arrived wearing a tag that brought tears to the eyes of the volunteer who met her. It said, "Please return these garments to the orphanage." If there are any rules of the committee, they are only to make these children as happy and comfortable as possible during their stopover between flights.

Johnny Beaver is one of the many Eskimo children uprooted from their homes by tuberculosis. His father dead, his family had been supported by an Aid to Dependent Children grant and his brother's hunting. Now his brother and mother have been moved to a hospital for pulmonary tuberculosis. Johnny himself is being sent by the Alaska Native Service to Bellingham, Washington, for treatment of bone tuberculosis at St. Joseph Hospital. (According to the territory's Department of Health, tuberculosis is the biggest health problem. In some northern and western villages, virtually every adult is tubercular. About 40 per cent of all new cases under the Aid to Dependent Children program have become eligible as a result of tuberculosis.) Johnny's village, west of Anchorage, has no medical care, except for a plane with a doctor and X ray which sometimes stops once during a summer.

The Kangas home is a simple, but comfortable, white frame structure with a big yard full of flowers, shrubs, even a few ducks. Johnny shows a shy curiosity about everything—especially the television and radio, which he seems to enjoy snapping on and off. But he jumps back startled when Shirley turns on the bathroom faucet so he can wash his hands before dinner. In his village, water must be brought by dog team from a pond one mile away.

For dinner there are roast and potatoes, which Johnny devours, and afterward the wonder of watching Shirley break three fresh eggs—something he has never seen before—for seven-minute frosting for the freshly made spongecake.

Time to go comes too soon for Johnny Beaver. And it CONTINUED ON PAGE 51

rly all the members were mothers, inter-

Health, one of the Guild's first speakers, why they were traveling to the States.

How should we treat these children?"

on after that calls began coming to the mittee chairman from downtown Travel-Aid headquarters. There were youngsters g to the Oregon State School for the Blind at Portland; to the Washington State School for the Deaf at Vancouver; to San Francisco for cardiac treatment; to Chicago for orthopedic care. If none of the volunteers had used sign language before, they soon learned how. To find out if one non-English-speaking guest was hungry, Shirley and Allan Kangas made elaborate motions of eating. In answer, the boy grinned and pulled out the menu the stewardess had served on the plane.

Occasionally the volunteers may find that a young traveler already has an escort. Even so, their services are always welcome. No one was happier to see a Travelers Aid representative than a harried Presbyterian minister returning from Japan with two tiny charges—a two-year-old half-Japanese, half-American girl and a four-year-old boy, also half American—going to adoptive homes. Both had wet diapers and were howling lustily. At once Mrs. Fern Schlewitz took the children to the nursery and changed them. That done, the crying stopped. The minister said he could look after the little girl—who promptly went to sleep in the waiting room—if Mrs. Schlewitz would take the boy to breakfast.

But not all the young travelers are Eskimo or Oriental. A number are children of Alaska residents going to homes of relatives in the States for vacation. Martha Clouse was thankful for her big back yard the day she brought home three lively youngsters, aged eight, ten and twelve, all loaded down with camping gear, tennis rackets, fishing poles, a cardboard carton and one suitcase. And on one special occasion, Shirley Kangas looked after an elderly woman traveler who seemed confused about where she was.

The one disappointment of this volunteer work is that there are "so many unfinished stories," as Shirley Kangas expresses it. "A child comes into your life, and you never know what happens to him after that." Martha Clouse did get a letter once from a fifteen-year-old Eskimo girl who stayed with her overnight. But all she could decipher was "Dear Mrs. Clouse."

Pastor Edwin H. Weibel, of the McMicken Heights church, tells about four-year-old Ok-ja Kim, from Seoul, Korea, who was his overnight guest between flights to Pocatello, Idaho, her future home. Travelers Aid usually recommends that adoptive parents of overseas orphans meet the plane at the port of entry. But because of the additional travel expense for the family, this is not always possible. Kim was suffering from both fatigue and fright when she arrived at the airport late at night, clutching a stuffed doll, so the Weibels took her home and put her right to bed. After the lights went out, Kim cried so forlornly the Weibels decided to wake their own five-year-old Mary. Mary, too drowsy to know what was happening, crawled obediently into bed with Kim. Both girls went right to sleep. The next morning, Kim apparently decided that this must be her new home and she ate a hearty breakfast. There was no way to explain to her that she must continue her journey, so Pastor Weibel simply picked up her stuffed doll, helped her on with her blue checkered coat and hat and drove her back to the airport. When Kim realized where she was, her little forehead puckered and tears rolled down her cheeks. "Putting her on that plane," the pastor told Guild members later, "was the hardest thing I ever had to do." All understood exactly what he meant, because none of them has yet found a way to say good-by to a child without tears. END

Come quickly in your small black shoes:
Such goodness must be held.
As farmers glean their shining grain,
I gather up my gold.

As farm wives trim the supper lamp,
I tend this gentle wick;
And it will serve to flicker hopes
And warm old dreams a bit.

Child with the birthday-candle

O soft, sweet-kissing bee,
What can I give you but a song
Who gave my life to me?

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

Erma, a dedicated housekeeper, thinks dogs and children come first—slip covers will wash.

Rain and wind are March gifts in our valley. The thrumming of the bitter storms is welcome. For the rain reaches deep into the frozen earth and frees the soil. The great winds move the ice from the ponds and sweep across frosty meadows. The forces of Nature are at work.

For humans, the raw damp air and roaring gales and the incessant pounding of chilly rain are not easy or comfortable. We are plagued with drafts in the old house, wet coats steam by the stove. Mud is everywhere. Even crossing the yard is a hazard when the galoshes skid in a newly dug hole where the Irish is looking for something.

Nevertheless, when I wake in the night and hear the thunder, I feel the swift excitement of spring-about-to-be. After all, I reflect, weather has to be understood, especially in New England!

Inside the house is warm, if we stay away from the drafts around the windows, and the fire seems even brighter in the pale light. It is a time for housewifely chores. Nobody minds cleaning out bureaus and closets when it is bad weather. In fact, it is a pleasure to sort and organize, to clean the copper and polish the silver, for there is no urgency to be out working in the garden or painting fences or pruning things.

It is never dull. Now Erma, who helps us out, decides she will wash all the curtains, starch everything except the wallpaper, and put extra coats of wax on all the floors. Then, she says, the dogs can track in all they want to, and she will only have to do one extra waxing. The undercoats will keep.

She is very firm about the dogs and the mud. "It is their home, too," she points out, "so it is no trouble to do the slip covers again, the first sunny day." A house is for living, she says.

A good many women who spend their lives keeping an immaculate house could learn from Erma. With a bottle of ammonia, and enough wax and detergents, Erma feels any amount of dirt is very temporary.

March is for good menus. A pork-chop-and-cabbage casserole tastes extra good. To make this, we brown the chops, season them. Slice cabbage very thin. Put the chops in a deep casserole and cover with the cabbage, with thinly sliced onion between the layers. Pour over milk to cover. Add plenty of seasoning (both pork and cabbage need plenty). Bake until chops are tender to the questing fork. This is a variable recipe, for you use as many chops as people will need, and as much cabbage as fills your casserole. Baked potatoes are a must, because that milk, onion, pork gravy is delicious on them. Any left-over goes into a good soup the next day. Generally it takes an hour at 350° F. for the dish to get properly done. We always plan on two chops per person, because they are so good.

For an easy supper, we like Texas hash. I chop together a medium onion and 3 stalks of celery and brown them in 1 tablespoon of butter or margarine. I add 1½ pounds hamburger and stir occasionally until brown. Then I add 1 cup of cooked rice and 1 cup of canned tomatoes. I simmer this on top of the range (or use an electric skillet) for twenty minutes. I season with salt, pepper, catchup and a dash of Worcestershire sauce.

In my lifetime, seasonal cooking has gone out. I remember when there were no frozen products at all. We used cabbage and squash and winter carrots. We never had strawberries in January. Now with the mort of freezer foods, nobody need bother about what time of year it is.

However, at Stillmeadow, we still like to poke around in the fruit cellar and bring up escarole, bedded in sand, and to bake acorn squash which we grew ourselves. And the modern canned products are now excellent. Gone are the days of the pallid peas, the limp beans, the few soups. With a little imagination, one could comfortably live with the canned things. They are seasoned better, processed more expertly and have infinite variety.

March is a good month for music too. On a wild and windy night, it is good to play favorite records. Even without a hi-fi, I enjoy them.

I like to tuck up in bed in March with a solid book. A book like The Search for Adam, by Herbert Wendt, not a book to gulp but so enlightening it is worth struggling over.

We seldom stop to think, except when such a book is written, how much we owe to the pioneers of science. They were exiled, they were persecuted, but they persevered. The urge for truth had dominated them, and dominates us today.

Now as winter recedes, the people of the woods begin to emerge. Now and then a weasel glides along the gray stone fences. The pointed face of a squirrel looks up from the feeder as his narrow paws reach for the best grain. The melting snow is patterned with tracks.

And Jonquil, the gentlest golden cocker, brought in a possum one night. A possum on the sofa presented a problem. Jill bore him out wrapped in a paper towel and put him outside the fence. She had just recovered from this when Holly, the Irish, steamed in with a field mouse.

The cockers and Irish are very patient with our vagaries. Although generations of hunting are behind them, they allow us to remove their treasures without a growl. They merely look sad.

Cats are not so kind. Separating a Siamese from a chicken bone takes more diplomacy than is in the United Nations. The difference is that a cat makes her own decisions and sticks to them. A dog doesn't really mind your being unreasonable; he prefers to keep you happy.

As far as records are concerned, we have given up playing the Cornell Bird Songs. No record player can long withstand the wild leapings of five or six dogs. Even if they are all sound asleep, and I tiptoe into the front room and play softly, hoping to learn to identify more birds, the first peep brings them all tumbling in.

One lesson, and only one, history may be said to repeat with distinctness: that the world is built somehow on moral foundations; that in the long run it is well with the good; in the long run it is ill with the wicked. But this is no science; it is no more than the old doctrine taught long ago by the Hebrew prophets.

JAMES A. FROUDE

About mid-March, Jill begins to get out the boxes of seed packets and sort them. She is utterly absorbed, now moving beets to one end of the cobbler's bench, now putting various lettuces and carrots at the other end. Then she rearranges them.

If I ask her a question, such as whether the pot roast is done, she never answers. She is out in the garden mentally.

"Do you want rosy chard again?" she says. "We had too much last year."

"Well, remember the rabbits," I say.

For the truth is that besides feeding the wild birds, the dogs, the cats, the squirrels, the tame pheasants, we also feed the rabbits handsomely. We have more rabbits than anybody.

When I say that they help themselves, Jill adds that they do. After she has hoed and planted and raised the crops. But I remind her how charming rabbits are, and we can always go to the grocery store and buy food, which they cannot do.

I love the smell of the end of winter, the beginning of spring. The pure smell of melting snow and the rich odor of wet earth and the scent of the dark wet pines are not to be missed.

I think of Edna St. Vincent Millay: "O world, I cannot hold thee close enough."

Since I was a child, the world has been a troubled place, with wars, fears, murder. I can barely remember when it was a peaceful world. One thing remains: to live every day in the best way we can, and to pray, for prayer is a strength in itself.

And it is good to watch the scudding clouds and feel the eternal sequence of the seasons. March has not changed since I walked out with my father to see whether the bulbs were up.

And April is just over the hill, shod in wild sweet violets. END

Letter From Spain

To the Ladies' Home Journal: Did you ever dream of castles in Spain? Well, I have found how to make that dream come true. You can do it overnight on a nonstop flight New York–Madrid. And on one airline, you can even make the crossing on planes bearing the romantic names Columbus used for his ships: the Niña, the Pinta and the Santa Maria. Fall asleep as you leave New York and awake eleven hours later in the land of your dreams.

Madrid is a spotless city of tree-lined avenues where you can sit in basket chairs at outdoor tables and lazily watch the world go by. It is a city of shady squares, sparkling fountains and women with mantillas and fans. At the hour of the midday siesta, banks and shops put up their shutters and streets are deserted until 4:30. When life starts up again, it goes at an increasing tempo until the early hours.

For an American with dollars to spend, prices are beyond belief. You can taxi almost anywhere for 14 cents. By bus, it costs less than 2 cents. And you can get a splendid dinner for two for $1.50. I am told it is possible to live in Madrid on $1.50 a day.

Castle and visitor

Of course there is no need to stay in the city at all. You can book a room at a 500-year-old castle, sleep in a duke's personal suite, in much more comfort than its original owner. The Spanish government controls these castles, and candles are all electric.

I spent two nights at Castle Oropesa. Its grand old towers appear against the sky almost as a ruin. Storks swoop down from their nests on its embattled walls. But the bedrooms have tiled floors, and from the enormous windows there is a magnificent view over the valley to a range of snow-capped mountains.

As you enter the great dining hall with its heavy oak furniture, magnificent oil paintings, priceless tapestries and figures clad in full armor on either side of the stone-arched doors, it is easy to picture the past. The great table is piled high with foods, a whole suckling pig as a centerpiece, plates of cold partridge, and tankards of ale.

You can live in these romantic surroundings for $3.00 a day including meals. A dozen such castles are available—all offering a rich storehouse of memories.

Yours sincerely,
OLIVER K. WHITING

Cancer Checkups

Grandview, Idaho

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: The material which the Cancer Society distributes urges women to have regular checkups by our doctors. But when we go for such an exam (and even have symptoms) the doctors take it so lightly! Would an article advising the medical profession to co-operate have to be published in the Medical Journal before doctors would read it?

Always Glad to Help

La Lima, Honduras

Dear Editors: Never underestimate the power of the JOURNAL! During the past few years, we have been troubled by thieves who have even entered our homes during the daytime. A friend of ours—a tiny dynamo weighing about 102 pounds—was resting a few afternoons ago when suddenly she heard footsteps. Dashing out to investigate, she found a robber in her living room. Looking around for some kind of weapon to use, she spied the new JOURNAL lying on a table, quickly grabbed it up and, rolling it, began to poke the robber in the ribs and beat him over the head. At such treatment he gave a yell and dashed out of the house.

We have heard of the help the JOURNAL has given to people all over the world, but I'll bet this is the first time you have heard of its being used as a weapon!

Sincerely,

Toymakers Speak Out

New York City

To the Journal: One of your readers recently asked: Isn't there some brand of toy that will last? As the business magazine of the toy industry, we say Yes. But when you next choose a toy:

First, be sure that it is American-made. A voluntary association, Toy Manufacturers of the U.S.A., has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in research to make sure that American toys are safe, durable and give true value for the purchase price.

Second, look for the name of the manufacturer on the toy or on its package. A reputable manufacturer is proud to sign his name and stands ready to back up his product.

Unfortunately, there is a tremendous influx of foreign-made toys which simulate our American products in appearance. If you follow these recommendations, however, I'm sure you will discover a new world of sturdy toys.

Cordially yours,

Dollar an Hour, Carfare and Lunch

Seattle, Washington

Dear Editors: Five days a week from nine until three I'm a working mother. I work for a dollar an hour, carfare and lunch, doing housework and caring for other people's children.

I made plans to go to work when my husband was seriously injured in an industrial accident. However, I had been out of the business world a long time, and soon discovered that employers didn't hire stenographers on a part-time basis. (I could work only during school hours, for I had no intention of neglecting my children for the almighty dollar.) Clerks in department stores must be experienced clerks. I couldn't sell, and even my efforts at telephone soliciting ended in failure. Apparently my only specialty was that of being a wife and mother—hardly salable.

A neighbor of mine had just had her fourth baby. She was tired and discouraged, and asked me if I knew someone who would take over while she slept for a week. I suggested an employment agency, but she had already called any number of them with unsatisfactory results. So I halfheartedly offered to help out until she made other arrangements.

The next morning I hurried through my own dishes and bedmaking and knocked on my neighbor's door at nine o'clock. I straightened her house, washed dishes and clothes, prepared lunch, ironed and kept the older children under control while she tended to the baby's needs. When I left that afternoon, she was a changed person—and I was six dollars richer. Somehow it didn't seem quite right to accept money for what I had been doing at home for free; but in a short time I was snowed under with phone calls from mothers who needed help desperately.

There were many problems to consider (one the possibility of arriving home after the children's arrival from school), but they were minor compared with the bigger one I had to face myself: the stigma associated with women who "hired out" to do housework for others. My husband took a dim view of my attitude. "If it's going to bother you, don't do it," he said, "but we must all serve in some capacity or another." And almost before I realized what had happened, I was in business.

In general, the advantages outweigh the disadvantages in this work I do. The hours are most favorable. The pay is daily. There's no cash outlay for sheer nylons every week. No lunch money to plan on, because lunch is furnished. Competition in this field is practically nonexistent. In fact, it's a shameful monopoly, and so often I wish it weren't. Because I get tired. But I always go back, for I think of those mothers who are tired, too, because they can't get away from their jobs—the humdrum monotony, crying babies, endless stacks of dishes, diapers forever piling up. In most homes, the regular cleaning wouldn't get done if I weren't available.

I hadn't realized the difficulty mothers faced in trying to locate reliable help, but their stories agreed consistently. Stories of women applying for baby-sitting jobs who obviously disliked children, who took delight in frightening their small charges, or who were too ailing and elderly for housework. On the other hand, if a woman applying for housework is capable and reliable, she can pick and choose among employers. I recognize almost immediately the well-run household, the well-adjusted wife and mother.

Last year I went to work for a mother with five children. An extra pair of hands was a necessity in that household; and after a particularly trying day, the mother remarked, "I'm sure heaven must have a very special place for mothers." However, most mothers don't think that far ahead. The problem is getting through today (or even the next few minutes) with a reasonable amount of sanity left. And that's when I realize how vitally important my job is.

Sincerely,
MARY R. CLAUS

WOODBURY HOLDS CURL BETTER, KEEPS SET LONGER

Can a marriage survive physical brutality?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

SHOULD A HUSBAND STRIKE HIS WIFE?

"My husband and I were married right after graduating from college seven years ago, and have three lovely children. He earns an excellent salary, and is very intelligent and well liked. But he has a violent temper. He often slaps me, sometimes so hard he knocks me down, and once caused me to break three ribs. Our quarrels usually start with some small thing I do which displeases him. He shouts at me, I shout back, and then I get hit. This ends it till next time. But I get more bitter all the time and often won't speak to him for days. Yesterday the children saw him slap me because I had left the door open with the furnace running. Do other wives of similar background get this kind of treatment? If I knew that other wives stand for it, maybe I could stand it better."

Shocking as the letter is, this wife's problem is far from unique. Our research among college couples shows that about one husband in five has struck his wife once or more often during the first half-dozen years of marriage. The proportion is nearly double among noncollege couples, higher still among heavy drinkers.

To some women, the thought of physical abuse from their husbands is intolerable. They would seek separation or divorce rather than submit to frequent such incidents, and if violence is threatened, they say so. The warning may induce the man to change his tactics.

But to be effective, an ultimatum must be backed up by the intention and the means of carrying it out. And some wives, like the one who wrote us, are unable or unwilling to seek a divorce, for financial or religious reasons, out of concern for their children, or because they still love their husbands, despite the difficulties. No large-scale statistics are available, but our evidence suggests that of all wives whose husbands sometimes use force, perhaps half manage to tolerate it.

Why are some men physically cruel to their wives? A very few are sadists, emotionally warped individuals who take pleasure in inflicting pain. In such cases, only expert professional counsel is likely to help.

Far more commonly, the husband's blows are the climax of an outburst of temper, often unleashed by drinking. The outburst is probably his way of letting off steam when the tension produced by accumulated frustrations has become intolerable. Some trivial incident, unrelated to his real grievance, may set off the explosion.

It is impossible to condone such behavior. Despite provocation (which may be greater than the wife realizes) no reasonable man resorts to brutality. But when temper overtakes him, he is not a reasonable man.

It follows that the wife must find ways of relieving pressure before it becomes explosive. For her own protection, she must take the initiative in a program of prevention.

Here are a few suggestions for any wife who suffers from her husband's abuse:

Gauge his mood, and govern your actions, suggestions, topics of conversation accordingly. Don't choose a time when he is overtired to discuss serious problems, or comment on his table manners.

Avoid arguments. When a quarrel is brewing, change the subject, introduce a diversion, or find an excuse for leaving the room. Don't try to defend yourself against his criticisms now, even if you are not to blame.

Indulge his whims. If he likes butter, salt and sugar on his oatmeal, serve it that way. Don't invite a quarrel by ignoring or ridiculing his minor preferences.

Help him relax. A pleasant, welcoming atmosphere at home is balm for jangled nerves; small physical attentions like the offer of a cup of tea bring comfort. A change of scene or activity can be a safety valve. It's worth delaying dinner while he works off his resentment against the boss by an hour's gardening or other exercise.

Share his burdens. Encourage him to discuss his problems, annoyances, grievances, as well as his ambitions and achievements. This means improving communication between you. But time your efforts carefully. Don't press his confidence when he is tired or overwrought.

Keep love alive. Naturally, you don't feel affectionate when he is behaving like a bully. But between times, don't be too proud to show him by word and deed that you still value his love. Remember that thwarted sexual drive is a powerful source of frustration.

A difficult assignment? Undoubtedly. Yet happy wives instinctively practice measures like these, not out of fear but out of love and concern for their husbands' welfare. Any wife, whatever her motives, can foster harmony in her home by similar preventive action.

WHO IS JEALOUS?

"We have a problem that I have never seen discussed. My two sons and daughter are married, and we are all very close except for one daughter-in-law. She is very jealous of my son's family. Her parents were divorced when she was ten, so you might think she'd appreciate being admitted to our family circle. Instead, she does pathetic things to keep us apart, and my son is afraid to visit us for more than ten minutes. My husband and I rarely see our little grandson, and she has invited my other son and his wife over only once in two years. Yet she entertains her own mother and brother two or three times a week. We buy her gifts, and Christmas presents for her relatives, and invite them all to share the holidays with us. She comes on special occasions only. My son, a college professor and a scholar, is one of the gentlest persons I know. He loves his wife, but there is a whipped look about him that hurts me. How in the world does one win over a jealous daughter-in-law?"

Let's analyze this letter and speculate about the daughter-in-law's feelings. It seems likely that she feels insecure, as girls deprived of their fathers before adolescence often do. Her insecurity makes her possessive, and she clings to what she has: her husband, child and relatives.

Probably, too, she is uncertain of her ability to measure up to her in-laws' standards. If her educational background is unequal to theirs, she inwardly thinks they look down on her. She fears that gradually their attitudes will undermine her husband's respect for her.

The mother-in-law's letter reflects her high opinion of herself, her husband and her children. The tone strongly suggests that she considers her son's wife his inferior. If this attitude shows up in a letter, can she conceal it from her son and the girl herself?

Does she feel a little resentful that her son doesn't insist on more opportunity to show his mother the respect and affection she considers her due? Admittedly, the son loves his wife. The "whipped look" may only reflect his distress that his mother cannot accept the situation and let him and his wife lead their own life.

We have speculated far beyond the evidence. But one thing is certain: the mother-in-law's tactics and attitude thus far have brought satisfaction to no one. That being the case, it is up to her (not her son or his wife) to modify her position.

Time has a way of healing wounds if they are not repeatedly opened. A breathing spell is badly needed. If you were the mother-in-law in this case, would you be generous enough to grant it?

DO YOU AGREE?

Are sex needs more imperative for husbands than for wives?

In most cases, yes. Unless a wife understands and allows for this difference, it can lead to much tension and disagreement.

ASK YOURSELF:

Do I Interest Him?

Many young wives complain that they find it hard to talk to their husbands. If you feel that your husband seems uninterested in what you have to say, honest "Yes" or "No" answers to these questions may help you to find the reason why.

Can, and do, you intelligently discuss with your husband:

1. Everyday happenings on his job?
2. One hobby or recreation that he enjoys?
3. Current news that interests him?
4. His dreams for the future?
5. Vacation plans for the family?
6. The children's needs and their problems?
7. Home changes or new furniture you want?
8. Personal worries he can help you with?
9. Some sport that he likes?
10. Neighborhood and community doings?
11. Difficult or upsetting aspects of his work?
12. Things you hope one day to do?
13. Greater financial security for the family?
14. Problems (not complaints!) that you have?

Credit one point for each positive answer, and another point for each matter you do discuss with your husband. A total score of 24 or more is very good, a score of 15 or less is low (20 is average). Analyze your score. If you can, but don't, discuss, you may be the one at fault. If you can't discuss intelligently but just rattle on, your need is for more information. Also, your timing may be at fault. Don't try to talk to him when he is tired, preoccupied or irritable!

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"There's a zipper on the back!"

I congratulated the contractor who tiled our second-floor bathroom twenty-five years ago: still uncracked, unblemished. He seemed slightly embarrassed. Maybe twenty-five years is too long.

If music is therapeutic for modern strain, I wish they'd make it easier to buy exactly the phonograph records you want. Nowadays my batting average is about .200; one tune I want for each four I don't.

Our most live-it-up neighbors now pack an electric skillet, coffee urn and toaster in their car, to eat breakfast more or less in bed, even in a motel on their winter drive southward.

"My husband keeps repeating there can be only one general in a family," confides Betty Comfort, brushing snow off her welcome mat. "But why does he assume so naturally that he is the general?"

I'm writing this on a snowy, icy road between Flagstaff, Arizona, and the Grand Canyon. A dozen times I've been cheated of a glimpse of the canyon when nearby. I'm convinced this time it'd be unpatriotic to skip it, ice or no ice.

Another thing we adults learn from our teen-agers is to take off necktie and shoes the minute we come into the house. But to learn to hang the tie on a lamp and center our shoes in the living room will take longer.

Our town's most adamant wag is a one-eyed sportsman who owns a wide assortment of glass eyes: for St. Patrick's day he invariably wears one with a tiny shamrock in the center. Stout fellah.

One of my favorite teen-agers reminds me that kids often inherit their habits from pa and ma. I assume he doesn't mean merely their good traits. So we'd better be careful how we criticize 'em.

We had a dinner guest, a young matron who parachuted down in the Himalaya foothills four months pregnant. She's had two more daughters, but seems calmer and better poised than some girls who aren't even married.

I've made a discovery about income-tax returns: they're not nearly so painful to fill out if you let your beloved wife help you in your lonely arithmetic; then life doesn't seem so stark or oppressive.

I've lost my argument with my Dream Girl that it doesn't raise the temperature to 72° any quicker if you set the thermostat at 90°. Our new dispute: she contends that one ounce of any cocktail appetizer I like a lot will fatten me a pound or more.

Some of our town's deepest thinkers make the same mistakes as Darwin, Marx, Lenin and Freud—they think we're half animal, half machine. . . . They're too pessimistic: this unpredictable breed sometimes produces preview samples who are half-gods.

To my astonishment I discover that several in our neighborhood who live in ten- or fifteen-room houses secretly yearn to live in a one-room cabin or a house trailer. What's happened to the cozy feeling of our "poor boy" days?

Next year I'll remind my favorite teachers at junior high to celebrate Abe's & G.W.'s birthdays the best way: by memorizing a one-minute snatch each from the Gettysburg soliloquy and the Farewell. Better'n shooting off a firecracker.

"If a woman is losing an argument," ponders Peter Comfort, wiggling his toes in a tight pair of shoe skates, "she subpoenas her 'intuition' as a star witness, and then try and prove her wrong!"

Maybe English ought to be taught in American public schools as if it were a foreign language: our youngsters abhor it more than Spanish or French. (But Pilgrim's Progress is no lark even in French!)

Maybe the wide-awake states (like Ohio, New York and Pennsylvania) with their four-lane toll roads deserve an extra congressman apiece as a reward. Not to mention New Jersey and Connecticut. (Descendants of railroad haters are now toll-road haters.)

One of our town's fashionable matrons in a burst of candor confessed that modern woman worships, above even men of glamour and wealth, the saintly man. "But we'd never admit it during a samba game!" she hedges.

I'm exploring a hi-fi record-player hookup for our remodeled farmhouse: I gather its components can be scattered all over: in the linen closet, up the fireplace and in the pantry flour bin.

A TV hater on our street has made a deal: if his next-door neighbor lets the kids come to their house for "must" programs, he pays for TV repairs and lets their kids use his swimming pool.

My seventh-grade English teacher told me every poem you learn at fourteen lasts forever and is worth $200 to you at forty. Northerners who memorized Snowbound and The First Snowfall in school never forget it even after they've moved to Florida.

Our club's Laertes swears his brain needs exercise as much as his tennis muscles. "Besides my newspaper," he lectures, "I need a good magazine article and some fiction daily, plus ten pages in a good book."

Ah, the problems our children and grandchildren must face! I eavesdropped on a radio thriller: "That wreck is a menace to space travel!" exclaims the hero. "We must disintegrate it!" Unsinkable space wrecks, afloat in interstellar spaces?

Why have there been so few divorces among the fashionables in our town the last few years? Even my Dream Girl, a close student of such phenomena, is puzzled for an answer. My diagnosis is that maybe our fashionables have made a careful study of second marriages.

Our 1957 teen-agers often dazzle us with inner grace: At a father-and-son luncheon club shower of prizes, a sixteen-year-old won a bicycle. "I've got a bike," he said. "Give it to some boy who needs it."

One advantage of being "in business for yourself" in our town: the "small" businessman can wear gaudier clothes. Execs in big corporations must dress more unobtrusively, like their boss' Ivy League friends.

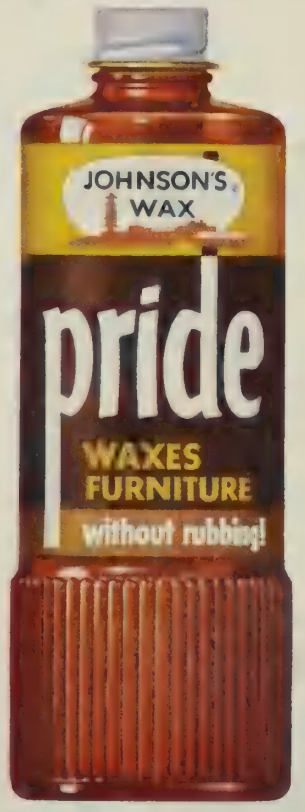
. . . When a dozen friends tell me what a lucky stiff I was to win my Dream Girl as my wife,

. . . Or my daughter-in-law calls me (affectionately, I think) by my first name,

. . . And my daughter proves she's inherited her mother's gift for warm, fascinating letters,

. . . Or our youngest suddenly decides to study chemistry and biology, because he's so fascinated by physics,

. . . And our newly winged lieutenant treats me as an equal when I drive with him to San Francisco on his way to Japan,



Then my cup runneth over again and I drink from the saucer.

Pure shortening, not a table spread.
Golden yellow from pure, wholesome carotene.

Expect surprising results when you use Fluffo; it's an altogether surprising shortening. To make it, we had to break down old-style shortening to its very molecules, and improve them; it takes the cream of the crop to make golden Fluffo.

No other leading shortening gives you such tender, flaky, golden-brown pies. No change in the measurement your favorite recipe calls for—just a wonderful change in results.

No other kind of shortening gives you such crisp, light, golden-brown fried foods. Everything fried right and light in Fluffo is beautifully browned all over—and just as digestible as it looks.

Fluffo even handles differently; it's so much lighter and fluffier it's a joy to use. Blends with fewer, easier strokes, and the golden color lets you see how perfectly you're mixing cake batter or pie dough. Try Golden Fluffo; how can you possibly miss?

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In March, 1907, Gelett Burgess coined the word "blurb" as "a noise made by a publisher." Won't You Come Over to Philly, Willy? came from Tin Pan Alley, Jack London wrote White Fang, and in some American communities women still took pride in hemming by hand all their sheets and tea towels and table napkins.

"Nothing is quite so cheap as department-store dummies," believes A Plain Country Woman in the March, 1907, JOURNAL. "In the false tinting of their hair and faces, the impossible forms, huge busts and ridiculous waists, young girls absorb dangerous theories regarding fascination and charm."

Beauty: "If you have prominent knuckles and wristbones, you can do nothing about it," advises The Lady From Philadelphia. "So do not mourn."

"Suet should be tried out at least twice a week," believes Mrs. Rorer. "It is an extravagant housewife who buys materials for frying. During my thirty-six years of housekeeping, I never bought a pound of lard."

Chaperons: "At the theater, opera and evening affairs in general, at restaurants and in traveling, no young woman should go alone with a man who is not a relative."

"No other people on earth, save our own, will tolerate the rocking chair," writes Editor Bok, who calls it "a pernicious habit" and "a diabolical invention, increasing nervousness and causing severe eye strain."

"How Shall We Furnish Our Home? First, buy only absolutely necessary things," advises the JOURNAL. "Second, buy the best article of its kind that can be afforded, and third, pay cash."

"Never buy a cheap bed spring. One of woven wire, properly reinforced, will cost $3 at least."

"Your article on telling our children the secret of their birth was so offensive and indecent that I am canceling my subscription," writes a reader. But a church wrote for a hundred copies of this "elevating article."

"Both spring and fall are suitable for marriages. At other times, the physical strength is more taxed than in the milder months."

"A radically modern kitchen has walls, ceiling and floor of cement with rounded corners and is flushed with a hose."

CHANDOHA

Katy, nee Baron . . . best of 28.6 million cats?

The life of an editor is filled with occupational hazards, like being unable to resist buying one of Walter Chandoha's photographs of cats. Above is a good example. When this bewitching kitten was born, Walter named her Baron, after Baron George Wrangel, who comes here once a year from his villa in Spain to pose with a patch over one eye for those shirt advertisements you see here and there. Later on, it turned out that her name had better be Baroness. Now she's called Katy. Compared with 23.2 million family-owned dogs, there are 28.6 million family-owned cats in this country, and we think Katy is the cutest of them all. They say the prophet Mohammed once cut off the sleeve of his gown rather than disturb his favorite cat that was sleeping on it. Yet Alexander the Great couldn't stand cats, nor could Napoleon. And don't ask if you can have Katy. Not if she had nine thousand lives!

Do you cry at the movies? Dawn Norman had just come dewy-eyed from ANASTASIA, in which the recognition scene between Ingrid Bergman as Anastasia and Helen Hayes as the grandmother was the most cry-compelling she'd ever sat through. Said she turned to see who was sobbing so behind her, and it was Marlene Dietrich. "And I always thought she was so controlled!"

A box of pink and white camellias has come from Natchez, Mississippi, freshly picked in the garden of Green Leaves, whose mistress, Mrs. Melchior Beltzhoover, reminds us that just ten years ago hers was one of the first families of How America Lives, the same year that Richard Pratt's eight pages of the glamorous old Natchez homes appeared in the JOURNAL; both features of course calling attention to the now famous Natchez Garden Pilgrimage that takes place annually in March. Mrs. B. recounts what happened subsequently. Pilgrimage attendance figures suddenly became double the population of the town, and continue to grow; the debt on the Mississippi River toll bridge at Natchez became paid in full by 1952 and the toll removed, and six more beautiful historic homes have been restored by greater Pilgrimage proceeds. And now we notice, in the recently published two-volume Guides to Early American Homes, by Dorothy and Richard Pratt, which tell you how, when and where to visit nearly 1800 of our finest heritage houses, that Natchez gets four times as many pages of pictures and description as any other locality in the country.

Isak Dinesen.

On their Russian journey the Goulds dropped off in Copenhagen to visit with Isak Dinesen, one of the truly rare storytellers of our time. She's really the Danish Baroness Karen Blixen, and her ancient country house, once a farm, faces the sea a few miles from Hamlet's castle at Elsinore. In her sunny rooms, beautiful with old polished French and Danish furniture, the baroness arranges her own flowers, enormous bouquets with vibrant contrasting colors, and tucked in for added foliage Mrs. Gould was delighted to espy enormous purple cabbage leaves from the vegetable garden.

What was most vivid about the baroness? we asked Mr. G. "Her eyes," he decided; "dark above and light below." Is there one word that describes her? we asked. "Yes—mysterious." Her voice varies, he said, between soft and vibrant. Across the room, through another conversation, Mrs. Gould heard her exclaiming, ". . . I love jazz! . . ."

She had been speaking of the years she spent till after the First World War, running her vast coffee plantation in British East Africa—experiences made imperishable in her fascinating book, Out of Africa—and how beautiful, noble, fearless and wise she found the natives there to be.

The baroness and the Goulds.

It was there, speaking only English for so long that she, a Dane, began thinking and writing in English, becoming—like Joseph Conrad, a Pole—a peerless writer of English prose. "She should have received it instead of me," declared Ernest Hemingway when he accepted the Nobel prize for literature in 1954.

"The picture with the baroness between us," said Mrs. Gould, "was taken after a heavenly lunch on her heavenly old china." What did you have for dessert? we asked, knowing Denmark. "Little French pancakes filled with plum-and-apricot jam," said Mrs. Gould with a sigh. "The best I ever ate."

The Blixen homestead.

In their love they had sworn faithfulness to each other, unaware then of the greater challenge to that love than physical honor.

BEGINNING A NEW SERIAL

By HOWARD SWIGGETT

THE DURABLE

The loveliest face he would ever see stared straight at him.

The last afternoon of the year was fading over the Hudson and there was utter quiet in the empty offices of Continental Industries Corporation in Rockefeller Center. It was the time set aside every year by Edward Rutledge, the chairman, to examine the personal financial statements of his principal officers. The officers themselves made them up and delivered them to him for his sole consideration. If what they owned and owed was unexceptionable, he destroyed the statements. The purpose was to satisfy him that "no one in a responsible post was in any sort of a jam, or under unusual pressure." Sometimes a word of caution against getting overextended followed, and in rare cases he had even had to warn against parsimony. His highly paid men were expected to live commensurately.

Rutledge had made this year-end rite into a symbol. He was at his desk when all were gone, the last man to leave the ship, the man who thought of everything. "Now let's see if we can't all remember this fall to put the lights out when we leave," he always told the office manager the Monday morning after daylight saving ended. "I'll always remember the shock it was to the late James A. Farrell in 1930 to find that U. S. Steel was spending five hundred thousand dollars a year on office equipment. It's very easy to get complacent."

By right of seniority Harold Titcomb, the head of the mail room, a veteran of fifty years with the corporation, took over the reception desk when Mr. Rutledge returned from lunch on New Year's Eve and the rest of the staff went off to the revels. It was not a hardship. On leaving, the chairman said, "Happy New Year, Harold," and shook hands with him, and Titcomb always found a fifty-dollar bill in his hand. It was a gift from friend to friend.

As the hour drew close to four, Rutledge was about through. In general the statements were very satisfactory. He was particularly pleased by the number of farm investments among the senior officers. He made a note to ask Evans whether, as he supposed, his large increase in common-stock holdings was the result of an inheritance—just as well to let them all know he kept informed.

Well, that was about it and he tore up all the statements except James Peale's. How in the world did Jim happen to have $500 of overdue bills? Well, must be an oversight and listed out of that meticulous rectitude characteristic of Peale.

Titcomb knocked as he was locking the statement in his private-file drawer. He said Mr. Lowry had arrived.

Rutledge had never met Lowry. Earlier in the month there had been a board decision to bring in an outsider as vice-president in charge of foreign operations, and a number of Rutledge's friends had strongly recommended Stephen Lowry, a man of about forty who was just leaving Government service abroad. He had arrived from Europe only a few days before.

Titcomb ushered him in. He was a good-looking fellow with easy, agreeable manners, but his appearance was somewhat startling to Rutledge. It was cold, almost bitter, outside, but Lowry apparently had neither hat nor coat and his face, neck and hands were red as a tramp's with the cold. He wore flannel slacks, a rather old but very expensive tweed jacket, a soft shirt and a gray knitted tie. Now in the summer Rutledge worked in his shirt sleeves as often as any man could in an air-conditioned office, but he did hope there was some sensible reason for this unconventional attire in a job hunter, even a very high-level one.

It was a little disturbing. A corporation office is not a country club or a college campus. He wondered what Titcomb would think of an officer dressed this way. Titcomb was under no difficulty. He took Lowry to be the new herdmaster at Rutledge's large Long Island "dairy farm."

"Well, Mr. Lowry," Rutledge began after the first greetings, "we've been hearing very good things about you, very good things indeed. I hope you're going to want to come with us. Our president, Mr. Johnson, was sorry not to be here this afternoon. We're building a new managing team of younger men which will be good for twenty years. There is no problem about pension or participation rights or seniority rights which we have not thought out and settled. A cordial and even fraternal welcome awaits the right man and I can safely say I don't know a place in any major industry with such opportunities. Is it the sort of thing that appeals to you?"

"Oh, very much so," Lowry replied. He did not think it necessary at that moment to say he was not interested in a "managing team" after the next ten

THE BIG

Everyone called him "the kitchen mouse"... even his wife. Who could guess the depths of his courage?

By ROBIN WHITE

Although it was later than usual when Anathan finished work in the kitchen, he took his time closing up for the night. As a rule he did not like to delay, principally because his wife, Tirumbala, had imposed a standing nine-o'clock curfew on his activities, a law Anathan had obeyed more or less dutifully ever since he and his teeth had parted company thirteen years ago. If he was breaking with tradition tonight, he was doing so not through any belated attempt to revolt, but because he had been trapped into indecision. It had been rumored during the day that Prutter dorai had decided to get another cook, and Anathan knew Tirumbala would now have it in for him either way, early or late.

With plodding thoroughness, he moved about the dingy room, checking to make sure he had overlooked nothing: fires out, windows bolted, floors sprinkled to keep down the dust; by no conceivable stretch of the imagination could he devise any further excuse to procrastinate. He ran his tongue slowly over his toothless gums. As cook he had worked in a wide variety of missionary bungalows throughout South India. He knew from well-tried experience that whether the kitchen was a big-city kitchen like the bishop's in Madura, or a modest one like the Prutters' here in the village of Meigudy, it made no difference. A practical limit existed to the number of excuses one could concoct at a given time. He had now reached that limit. There was nothing left to do but go home; and since that had its grim aspects, Anathan's face took on an appropriately grim expression, one which he eyed without enthusiasm in the fogged mirror by the door.

His was not an old face, but the particular shape and arrangement of his features—the beaklike nose, elephant ears, prominent forehead and cheekbones, large round eyes pressed too closely together under thin eyebrows—combined unhappily to give him a gaunt, cadaverous appearance, especially pronounced about the mouth, where his barren gums caused his cheeks to sag forlornly as if his time had long since been up.

Naturally Anathan was inclined to be sensitive about this. Often it seemed to him that the root of all his problems, both physical and spiritual, lay in his premature loss of teeth. At any rate, he had more than a sneaking suspicion that Prutter dorai's resentment was, for some strange reason, directed against him on this score. Everyone on the bungalow staff, from lutchee to chokra boy, knew that Mr. Prutter had long cherished a most ardent and unprovoked dislike for Anathan. The animosity seemed to stem not from any specific cause but rather from some basic difference between the two men. They were, the servants explained in response to all inquiries on the subject, as opposite as night and day.

A swift estimate of Mr. Prutter, on the one hand, might have included such qualifying adjectives as "direct, vigorous, aggressive." Mr. Prutter was all these things. He timed his actions, budgeted everything, measured his stride and the strength of his grip, slept without a pillow, clipped his words and got to the point. In fact, he was so capable and seemed to do everything so much better than anyone else that most people retired without argument to let him do it all, which he did. At any time of the day he could usually be traced by the whirlwind of activity that arose and subsided according to his arrival and departure. He was forever in the thick of it—possibly because he happened to be just that—now dashing off in all directions, now issuing commands. When he spoke it was with a sort of voracious roar, and his words were invariably accompanied by much free-flying spittle. Thus it was altogether fitting that he should be equipped

She had already had three husbands . . . wasn't that enough?

Candy's skin pricked with exasperation and an instinctive hostility. does she do it?

"Getting married," Mollie said, looking very pink, "is not being sold into slavery! As I told Adam when I took my new job. So he said I was a slave to interior decoration and if he'd wanted to marry a paper hanger he would have, and I said that if he'd wanted to marry a good cleaning woman he should have, and then he said I was being illogical and unfair."

To mask her alarmed apprehension, Candy carefully put another log on the fire. "So then what happened?" she asked, dusting her hands.

"So then I came down here—three days early," Mollie said triumphantly. "Just to show him."

Candy sat down and put her feet up on the hassock. "Didn't he mind?"

"He was furious." Mollie's tone was one of deep satisfaction. "But Adam has got to learn I am not a chattel. I have a right to my own life. I must have my independence!" At Candy's startled glance, she added hastily, "Oh, I don't want to divorce Adam, darling! I just want to kill him."

Candy relaxed. "Oh, well, all right. Goodness, you gave me a turn."

Mollie gazed into the fire. "You have no problems with Bill, have you?"

Candy, too, gazed into the fire. . . . To be petty and disloyal? Or to tell Mollie the truth? She sighed deeply: telling the truth was a luxury too tempting to resist. . . . She turned, lowering her voice: "Between you and me, Bill has one really frightful fault. He never thinks anything I suggest is any good. He throws cold water on all my ideas all the time. You must have noticed it."

Mollie began cautiously, "Well, of course Bill is very conservative, but then, most men ——"

"Hi!"

They both jumped. In the doorway stood Clover Tuckwell, her bright gray eyes beaming through round spectacles, her impertinent nose rosy with cold.

"May I come in? I just came over to welcome Mollie."

Greetings were clamorously affectionate. Clover sat down between them, wedging her small feet onto the hassock.

"I need your advice," she announced. "I've got a problem."

"So have we," said Mollie darkly. "Men."

"Oh. M-m-m. Yes." For a moment Candy thought Clover's small, pale face looked a little pinched. No doubt it was the cold, for Clover went on quickly, "My problem is much worse. It's Brenda."

"Brenda?" Candy was puzzled.

"Brenda Dickson. Brenda Holmes. Brenda Billings. Toby's first cousin, once removed. I'd like to remove her once and for all." Clover glared like an inflamed female owl. "Brenda has invited herself down to spend New Year's weekend with us. I am planning to slit my veins in a warm bath."

"Why?" Mollie inquired with interest.

"Brenda always makes me feel sort of half-witted and—and bony; as though I'd been in the third grade for years and years."

"What's the matter with her?" Candy demanded.

Clover smiled evilly. "Once, when Brenda was going to a psychoanalyst, she told me she had a persistently recurring dream—that she was the only woman on a battleship."

"Brenda needs a psychoanalyst?" Mollie asked incredulously.

"But the maddening part is," Clover went on, "that men take one look at her and marry her. I think she's had three husbands—one of whom belonged to somebody else. Anyway, right now she's at liberty. I think she's coming down to Queenstown to case the joint."

There was a pause. The fire crackled. The east wind rattled the windows. Then Mollie observed dreamily, "It must be awfully stimulating to be a divorcee"; and Candy: "I wish Bill were a bachelor. They're so much more interesting."

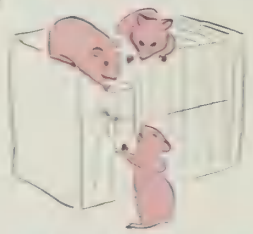
The Complete Book of Absolutely

By ELINOR GOULDING SMITH

It sometimes happens, even in the best families, that a baby is born. This is not necessarily cause for alarm. The important thing is to keep your wits about you and borrow some money. Many women attempt to keep a baby without any previous experience, and may not even know what a baby is. A baby is, actually, something like a very small human being in appearance, and comes in two kinds—boy and girl. If you are not certain which yours is, look at its blanket. If the hospital has wrapped it in a blue blanket, it is a boy; if in pink, a girl. Sometimes the hospital may run out of one color or the other and use the wrong kind, but in this case they are supposed to notify you.

Once you know whether your baby is a boy or a girl, it is a good idea to give him a name. It will save endless trouble in later years when you want to call him to clean his room or mow the lawn. (He won't answer anyway, of course, but that's another subject.)

Picking the right name for the baby is beset with difficulties. There are so many to choose from that the new parents are apt to sink into a feeling of utter despair. If you can't decide and you don't happen to have a handy family name that can be used, literature and history are endless sources of handsome and inspirational names, like Calvin Coolidge, Benedict Arnold, Genghis Khan, and so on. If the baby is a girl, movie stars' names are often suitable and lovely, like Rita Hayworth, Dolores Del Rio or Marjorie Main.



However, the fact is that whatever name you choose, the baby, some years hence, will hate it anyway, and decide to have his friends call him Slats or Rocky, so the whole thing really doesn't make too much difference. If the baby is a girl, however, you can give her a middle name, and as soon as she's old enough to talk, tell her that the middle name is her first name. Then when she's fourteen, and using green ink and putting little circles over the i's instead of dots, and complaining that all the other girls use mascara and eye shadow for school and you're treating her like a baby, she'll decide to use her middle name for a first name, and everything will come out right after all.

When I mentioned that in appearance the baby resembled a very small human being, I meant just that. For it is in appearance only, and the resemblance is slight at that. The truth is that a baby is hopelessly stupid. He can't read or write or do arithmetic or pay his bills. He is perfectly helpless, and you will simply have to do everything for him or he will get his affairs in a mess. There are, however, two things he can do. He can eat and he can cry. The latter he can do any time he wants, and he wants to rather often. The former is very tricky and will be dealt with later. (That is, I will deal with it later. You'll have to deal with it right now. He's hungry again, and it is your baby.)

Keeping a baby requires a good deal of time, effort, thought and equipment, so unless you are prepared for this, we recommend that you start with a hamster, whose wants are far simpler. For a hamster, you need only a small cage, some cedar shavings, a bottle for water, and some seeds and tiny scraps of celery, lettuce, and so on. If you are determined to try your hand at keeping a baby, you will need to provide yourself with a crib, a folding bath table (which you will never fold) and a carriage (you haven't got a car and he has to have his own carriage) to start off with, and later you'll need a playpen, a table with a seat in the middle, a car seat and a car bed (and now you'll have to get a car).

Still later you'll need tricycles, bicycles, roller skates, ice skates, plaster casts, sutures, and so on. You will need little knitted sheets, soft little blankets, little smooth towels and washcloths, something mysteriously called a receiving blanket, and lots of puzzling little garments called gowns, wrappers, and so on. Some babies also require caps and bootees, but these can often be obtained at little expense from an enthusiastic grandmother. However, all babies require rubber sheeting and quilted crib pads and diapers.

The diaper, which is the most urgently needed article of apparel, is primarily a square or oblong of absorbent material which fits absolutely nothing. It is too small to be a sheet and too big to be a handkerchief. It is also too big to be a small baby's diaper and too small to be a big baby's diaper. If you closely examine the shape of a diaper and the shape of a baby, you will find no similarity whatsoever. A person from another planet coming across a diaper for the first time would never in a million years guess its use.

Unless you can give a baby lots of time, effort and thought, you may do better with hamsters.

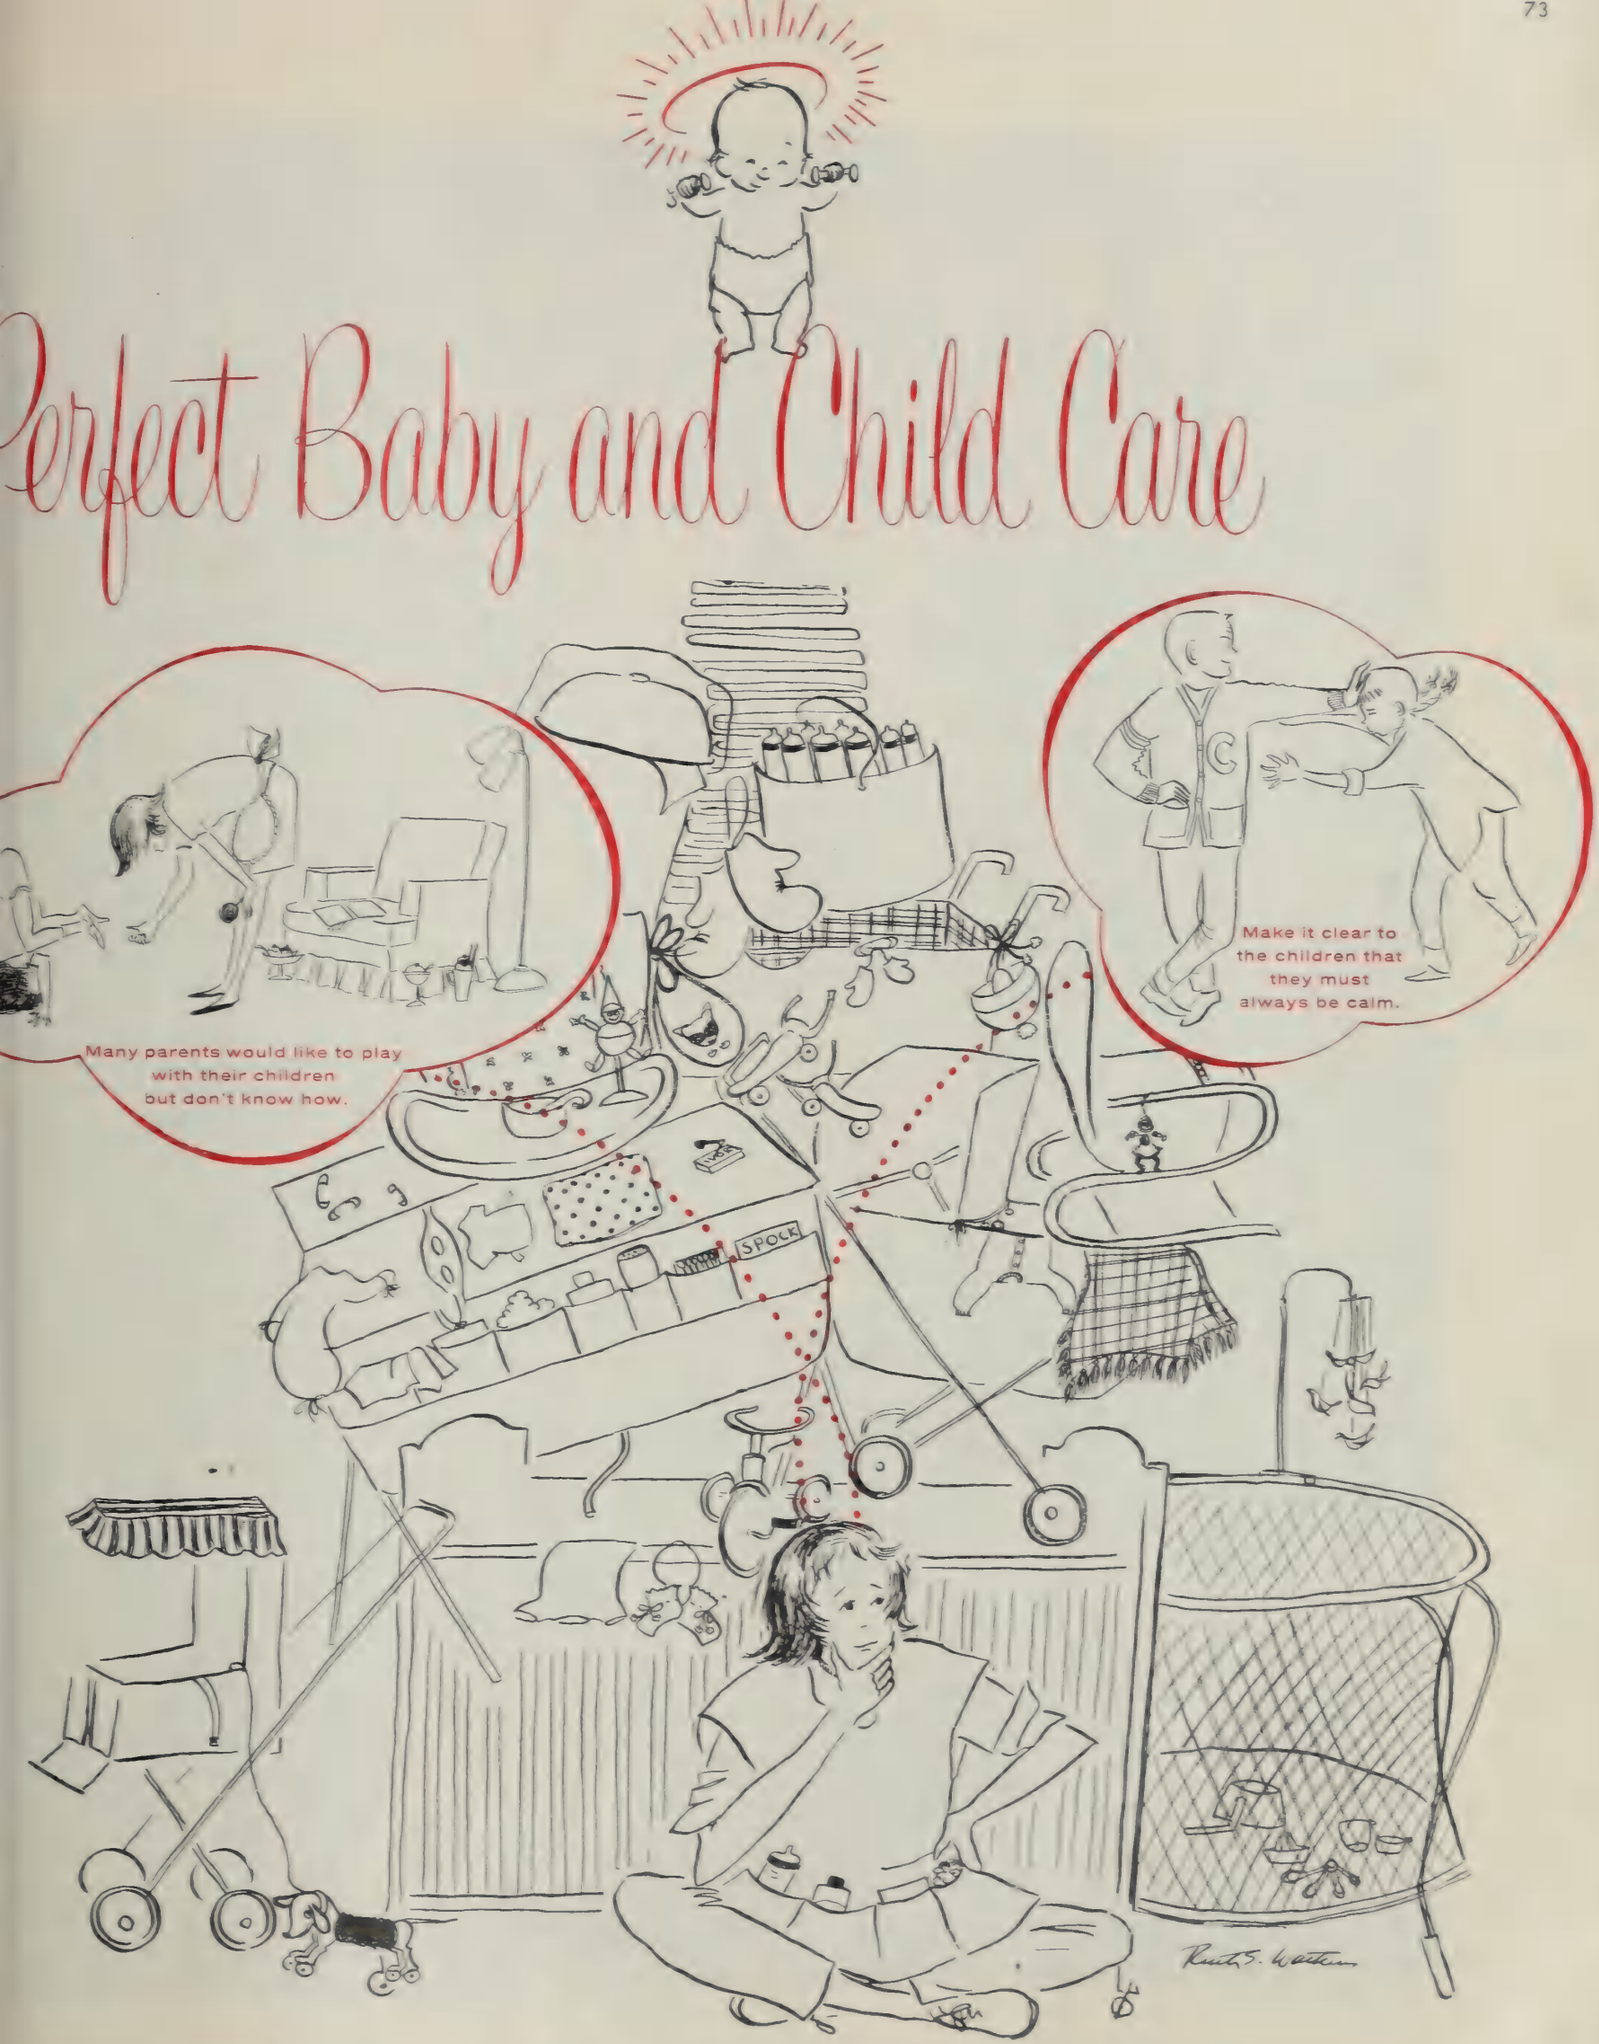
Now for those who have never diapered a baby, here is how you do it. You spread out a diaper on a bed or table. Spread out a clean baby in his crib. Look at them both closely. Puzzling, isn't it? Fold the diaper sort of in thirds and then fold up one end of the now-folded-in-thirds diaper about one third of the way. Put it on the baby quickly, pin it wherever you can without sticking yourself, and then hastily hide the whole, ill-fitting thing with some sort of gown or wrapper or receiving blanket. (So that's what a receiving blanket is for. I've always wondered. I thought maybe it was for dressing up to receive visitors.)

Remember all this time that the hamster needs only cedar shavings, which are changed weekly.

A baby has no teeth, so unless you handle him very roughly, you need have no worries about biting. However, presently, with considerable travail, teeth slowly appear. It is at this time that you must be on guard. Nevertheless, even before the teeth come in, it is wise not to handle the baby too roughly until he has become accustomed to you. Babies should not be picked up by an arm or a leg. You will notice, too, that babies do not have a fold of skin at the back of the neck, like kittens, and cannot be picked up in this way by the mother's teeth. Babies should not be picked up in such a way that their heads hang down, as their neck muscles are not strong enough to support the head. In fact, I'm not sure there is any way to pick up a baby. Maybe it would be best to let him lie there. Later, if you must move him, you could wrap him well in a blanket, and then lift him by it.

There is no serious danger in keeping a baby during the first few months, as he is quite unable to get about by himself. He can't even roll over. He will lie wherever you put him, and his only exercise consists in waving his arms and legs about. (Later he will send away for muscle-building courses, but you needn't worry about that yet.)

Naturally you want to give him freedom to move his arms and legs, but at the same time you want to avoid the possibility of drafts and colds. You therefore try to bundle him up tight in his gowns and wrappers and receiving blankets so he can't kick them off. Some mothers stay awake all night in order to cover up the baby every time he kicks his covers off, while others hermetically seal the entire house so that if he does kick the covers off, there will be no drafts. Still others wake their husbands up every hour and make him look to see if the baby is catching a cold. (He isn't, but the husband is.) This dilemma lasts only until the baby is old enough to turn over by himself. By then, as it has become apparent that even a new mother cannot keep him covered, most mothers give up the struggle and go back to sleeping themselves.



Most babies are fed about every three or four hours during the early CONTINUED ON PAGE 169

The Man in the Car

By NANCY TITUS

Everything is wrong tonight; even the car doesn't drive right, thought Martha feverishly. The old station wagon had a drag to it, a heaviness, as it did when she brought home the week's groceries from the Locust Hill village. Yet there was no load: only herself and the three children in the car.

I hope I'm not getting a flat. She had never changed a flat in her life, and what a place for the first attempt! She was driving back from the doctor's along the lonely woods road which wound from the main street of this little community on Long Island's north shore to the drive of the huge, isolated house she and Drum had rented sight unseen two months ago from Chicago, taking it in delight at the prospect of four baths and as many acres, surprise at the low rent, and not a thought for the probable inconveniences. I'd hate to have to stop here, she thought, and I've left the flashlight in the kitchen.

Whenever Drum went out of town on business the disasters began to accumulate, as though they waited like satanic imps to pounce when she was alone. She had suspected a fever in the baby, Terry, during the afternoon, discovered that his temperature had mounted to 104° while she was feeding supper to Butch and Lisa, who were four and three years old respectively. Disaster one. For Terry had a tendency to convulsions when his temperature rose. Disaster two: the phone was out of order. When she lifted the receiver to call the pediatrician she got nothing but an impenetrable hum. The electricity would probably go next: it failed as frequently as the phone. There had been no other course but to pile the children in the car, bundling Terry against the sharp chill of the October night, and drive to the doctor's home. Her one bit of luck was finding him at dinner.

"Mommy, there's someone on the back seat," said Butch suddenly. He was leaning against the front seat, round chin pressed to the leather. "Somebody went to sleep on it."

"Nonsense!" she said, the more crisply for the nasty jar his cool announcement gave her. "There's no one in the car."

"Under the blankets."

Her heart gave an unpleasant thump. "Don't make things up." She reached to adjust the rear-view mirror as they approached a street lamp.

For a brief second the yellow glare illuminated the car: shone on Martha, her slim figure in the brown suède jacket and tweed skirt, her straight hair and delicate sharp-boned face, was reflected in her gray eyes; caught the soft blue-eyed faces of children. The light passed to the back seat. She glanced in the mirror, seeing nothing but a tumbled pile of plaid car blankets.

Relieved, in spite of knowing the absurdity of her alarm, she said, "You and Lisa must have been in the barn playing in the car this afternoon and put the blankets on the seat."

"We weren't in the barn."

"You don't remember. I don't want to hear any more about it. Lisa, have you still got the prescription we picked up?"

"Yes," said the little girl, clutching the package with chubby hands.

Martha laid a hand against Terry's cheek. He was propped beside her. The skin was still burning. She grabbed the wheel again as they came to a curve and the car gave an odd lurch. Something was the matter with it.

Drum, she whispered to herself. Drum, why must you have a job that takes you off all the time? She hated being left behind to shift for herself. There were times when she almost hated Drum for leaving her. He was gone when babies were due to be born, when the children were sick, when she needed him most. "You'll manage," he always said cheerfully.

Her mother wrote, "I don't think Drummond should let you stay by yourself, a young girl like you, not twenty-four, who has always been protected." There were times when she agreed with her pampering, possessive mother.

"Mrs. Carroll," he called softly. "Mrs. Carroll, I know you're in there."

If only the phone was working when she reached home. She had reported it from the drugstore. If she could call Drum in Montreal and have the comfort of his warm, sympathetic voice. The quickening of love in his tones always renewed her own love.

The headlights' beams picked out the stone pillars at the entrance to the long drive to the house and she turned. Just then she was sure she heard—felt—a sliding, shifting of weight in the back. In a moment of panic she pictured a drunk staggering out of Moray's Bar in the village, crawling into her car.

Lights were on in the stone gatehouse near the road where Jonas Fielding lived with his young wife. Jonas was a plumber who had tended the pipes of their house for twenty years, since the days when old Pierre Rochefort, the great-uncle of their landlord George Rochefort, had lived there. She slowed before the house which was a quarter of a mile distant from her own. Through the translucent red leaves of the Japanese maple outside the kitchen window she could see Alice Fielding's pretty blond head bent over the sink.

She could run inside crying, "I think there's someone in the car."

She turned around, looking back, but all she saw was the rumpled pile of blankets, and at once sanity returned to her. I'm getting hysterical.

She could imagine Jonas stomping out, brusquely impatient, looking in the car and laughing. "There's nothing here, Mrs. Carroll." To Jonas, long accustomed to the rich, she was a nobody. He continued to administer to the intimate innards of the house George Rochefort had inherited from his uncle—along with much other property—because he was paid to do so, but he regarded the Carrolls as upstart sharecroppers. Only this afternoon he had been in the house to tend a stopped-up bathtub, leading the way through the rooms, a dignified and authoritative figure for all his workaday red-and-black plaid shirt and peaked cap. He spoke of the days when the house had been in its elegant glory, peered disparagingly at the meager furnishing with which the Carrolls had tried to fill the enormous rooms. His large nose quivered with disdain, his kinky gray brows lifted at the servantless way they lived.

No, she couldn't turn to Jonas. Alice she did not mind, for she detected a friendly light in the girl's pale blue eyes whenever she was not in the overbearing shadow of her husband, but she couldn't be sure Alice was alone.

Martha cast another look at the back. It is just the blankets.

She started up the hill drive. The house loomed ahead, above, a thin spiral of smoke drifting up from the chimney which drew the furnace. The furnace. Inwardly she groaned. She had heard Lou Radiski in the basement while she was readying the children to go out, shaking it down, piling on coal, opening

FROM PHIL BURCHMAN

"The press are always criticizing me for my peep-toe shoes," says the Queen, "but I'd like to see them stand all day in high-heeled court shoes." She no longer wears straight skirts in public, because of difficulty involved in getting into and out of cars gracefully, with photographers always at hand.

The nine men and women who make clothes for the Queen of England have the toughest assignment in the fashion business. "The wrong dress can and there is the added problem of making

Royal

She is rich beyond reckoning, youthful, pretty, slim, and she wears a dazzling crown. Yet dressing her is the toughest assignment in the fashion business.

Elizabeth the Queen of England is the world's most distinguished client, but the firms on whom she bestows her custom are distracted by countless formalities and anomalies, by national implications and archaic procedures. The wrong dress can be a slight to a dominion. A slipshod stitch could rock the throne. The dressmaker who designs for the British royal family must understand the modern role of royalty as well as the historical one. He must consider problems which are not only personal and professional but political too. He must swear to make no publicity out of the most photographed girls in the world. He must submit absolutely to their choice. And he must somehow come to terms with fashion while combating the personal royal preference for powder blue. No one, of course, has ever turned the job down.

Today the team of nine men and women mainly concerned with royal dressing consists of four dressmakers, three milliners, a shoemaker and a corsetière, all with London salons. They are more than the Queen's subjects, they are her slaves. "We would do anything, anything in the world, to help that girl," one of them assured us with emotion, "if only she would let us."

The reasons she cannot, will not, does not let her designers take over are many and valid.

On state occasions, for which their dresses are always stately, grandiose and new, the royal ladies are the central figures in a pageant. When the Queen went with her husband on a state visit to Sweden, her dressmakers were warned that she would be seen constantly against the vivid Swedish national colors of blue and yellow. When she went to Paris, they had to remember not only that the uniforms of the Garde Républicaine would be scarlet, but also that the Queen would wear the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honor, a sash in biting clear scarlet. And on British state occasions she wears the peacock-blue corded silk sash of the Order of the Garter pinned with a huge gold-and-diamond star.

Moreover, all the other characters in the pageant must be taken into account. There has never been a day when the family clashed. "I explained to the royal ladies the predominant motifs of the dresses I was designing," says Norman Hartnell about the Coronation, "so there should be no confusion of color." And the family procession was, in fact, the masterpiece of this master of pageant clothes, a mounting crescendo of white and gold echoing the Abbey's golden carpet and golden chandeliers, each successive royal lady more magnificent than the one before, and culminating in the splendid, fragile, opalescent dress of the Queen.

This color teamwork is demonstrated at Ascot, where the six royal ladies (the Queen, Princess Margaret Rose, the Queen Mother, Princess Royal and the Duchesses of Kent and Gloucester) turn up on four successive days in four different outfits—and look as harmonious as a bunch of sweet peas.

One dress which symbolizes the political problems involved in dressing royalty was the Queen's wedding dress. It was to be made of British satin, ordered from an impeccable source, the Scottish firm of Winterthur at Dunfermline. But the whisper got around that the silkworms which made it were Italian, and possibly even Japanese. It was unthinkable that Mr. Hartnell should employ enemy silkworms. So the worms were screened for anti-British activities. But they got a clean bill. They were Chinese worms, and Nationalist at that.

Although she does not take so much interest in her personal clothes as the average young woman of her age, the Queen is earnest and careful in her choice of ceremonial dresses. She turned down eight different designs for her Coronation gown. She turned down a dress all white and silver because she thought it was too like her wedding dress. She turned down a dress embroidered with all the emblems of Great Britain, because it did not have the emblems of the dominions. She turned down the idea of copying the youthful

Dressmaking

By DRUSILLA BEYFUS and ANNE EDWARDS

ll-white dress worn by Queen Victoria, be-ause Victoria was eighteen and unmarried t the time, whereas she herself was older and narried.

"I made the mistake," says Norman Hart-ell, "of asking for the daffodil of Wales (to embroider on her skirt). 'A daffodil!' ex-laimed the Garter King of Arms. 'On no ac-count will I give you a daffodil. I will give ou the correct emblem of Wales, which is a eek.'" Sadly the dismayed Mr. Hartnell went nto his garden, pulled up a leek and looked t it. In the end the unlovely leek held its head p with the rest, with the pale pink Tudor rose f England, the mauve thistle of Scotland and he green shamrock of Ireland. For it was embroidered in white silk and diamonds with eaves of palest green.

The mere size of a royal order, along with he fantastic handwork involved, is a chal-enge to any dress designer. On a royal tour he Queen is often expected to change six or even times a day.

For her ten days' tour of Sweden, of which ne week was a private visit, the Queen took wardrobe of five coats, five frocks, two suits, our evening dresses, three tiaras and a mink tole—sixteen outfits for a three-day state isit. On her tour of Nigeria (twenty-one days) he wore eighteen new day dresses alone.

It is not vanity which decides the size of er wardrobe. Even for an identical occa-ion in a different town, the Queen would not wear the same outfit. If she wore a special lress for a special occasion in Ottawa, she would not wear the same dress even for a imilar occasion in Montreal. The people of Montreal might feel slighted.

But it is wrong to imagine that the clothes re worn once and thrown away. They are worn hard (two dresses designed for the Queen to wear in Nigeria she wore also in Sweden and one of them she wore again at he wedding of her lady in waiting, Miss Kathryn Stanley). Clothes which do survive re passed on to obscure cousins and aunts.

Every royal dressmaker faces the problem f making three very short women look regal. The Queen is five feet three. Princess Mar-aret is five feet one. The Queen Mother is the ame height as the Queen. All of them wear wo-and-a-half-inch heels, but, more than eight, it is the lavishness and the weight of embroidery on their clothes which give them the richly royal air.

One cocktail dress for the Queen can have as much as four pounds of little gold beads embroidered on precious velvet, all by hand. It takes three hours for one skilled embroider-ess in Hartnell's workshop to embroider a piece of material four inches square with the extraordinary and varied assortment of beads with extraordinary and varied French and English names which he uses on the royal dresses: the glittering beads are called in the dress trade "barrettes," "navettes," "bugles," "pills," "dahlias," "little cogs," "cabou-chons," "chips," "pickled onions," "sea urchins," "copper appliqués" and of course his favorite "sequins." It is Mr. Hartnell's proud claim that never a bead has come loose. To get the job done quickly, five girls work round a frame on the same piece of material, following the designer's penciled outline. Even the pattern of embroidery which ac-companies the sketches of the dresses which he sends to the palace will take four hours to complete.

A strictly formal relationship is maintained by the royal family with all the people who dress them, even though they have known them for years. Hartnell, who has made clothes for them since 1937, must still drive his gleaming Rolls-Royce to the tradesmen's entrance at Buckingham Palace, wait in a little anteroom to be summoned by a ladies' maid, bow twice on leaving the royal pres-ence. The strict form is to bow once as you take your leave, back away, and bow once more at the door.

"It's a problem," said one royal warrant holder, "to bow, take a line on the door han-dle without turning to look behind you, back toward it and hope to find the handle within your grasp." Sometimes they are helped by having a footman hold open the door; some-times, if they are awkward about it, they see a twinkle spark into the royal eyes. Neither the Queen nor her sister has quite got over an urgent desire to giggle at the people who are comically flummoxed by royal etiquette or overdo it.

But if they treat their dressmakers like tradesmen, they extend to them their well-known courtesy to all tradespeople. "The at-mosphere is

The Queen Mother is regarded by many as better dressed than either of her daughters. All customarily wear pastels or white, for higher visibility. We designed this house to take today's growing family in its stride. It will always have room for one more—within reason. It lets you face the future with peace of mind. But the rooms to grow up to are built in at the beginning. You can economize at the start by waiting for the final completion of certain rooms until they're wanted. There will never be any need for later costly additions. Fully finished, it's in the $22,000–$28,500 range, depending where you build.

In appearance and performance, the house is as contemporary as they come. Yet in common with all our More for the Money houses, this one takes its cue from the most time-tested feature of true American traditional. It grows upward instead of outward. For it is just as much a fact today as it was in the past, and will be in the future, that more room upstairs is less expensive than more room on one floor—less expensive to build, to heat, to maintain. And far less expensive for future expansion.

The styling is timeless, and when would anyone ever outgrow that family room which can open fully into the kitchen, or be a self-contained dining room by the closing of two doors! Look carefully at a living room that has the rare quality of seclusion without isolation. And finally, consider the sleeping space, the playing space, the storage space upstairs. TERRACE NEWS

- A new or used park bench gives more seating space for less money. Exterior enamel preserves its good looks through all the seasons. Repaint it when you repaint the house trim.

- Colorful, comfortable canvas-and-wood chairs move out onto the terrace, into the screened pavilion, inside to the family room—whenever and wherever they're needed. Shipped flat, they're easy to assemble; folded flat, they're easy to store.

- Bright pillows add comfort to the seating, color to the scheme. Slip-cover them in washable, sunfast fabrics, or use plastic-coated materials, now available in a multitude of shades and textures. A quick wiping with a damp sponge is all the care they require.

But upstairs and down, there's more room for the future every time you turn around.

Though it's lovely and practical by day, it's after dark when this garden really begins to bloom. Its nights are just as usable as its days, and some believe more beautiful. It's as perfect for parties as it is for relaxing alone. The little screened pavilion is a few seconds by wheel tray from the family-room kitchen, and the flagstone paving is as smooth as a floor. The planting is no more in the way than are the pictures on the wall of a room indoors. It is really an open-air room in every sense of the word, and as much a part of the house as any room inside. The vertical battened wall of the carport gives it protection from the street. The attractively new (and delightfully inexpensive) reed fencing is framed here with enormous style and makes a neighborly screen. Three striking columnar ginkgoes rise from a narrow bed in which chrysanthemums follow summer annuals and spring bulbs. Rhododendrons are a year-round attraction, and on the right against the house the flaming foliage of the sorrel tree goes brilliantly with the pink-stained walls. The low JOURNAL reflecting fence completes the enclosure.

But the dramatic note is the illumination. This can be anything from a gentle glow to bright as day. You can spotlight any one particular place, or you can give the whole garden an even over-all luminosity. All wiring is hidden away, of course, and all the fixtures but the Japanese-lanternlike lamps in the pavilion and the fixture on the wall are virtually invisible by day. It's fun here to look forward to the evening, but in house and garden alike it's even more fun to look forward to the future.

Here in the garden by daylight you clearly see close up the low Journal reflecting fence with which the house is framed both front and back, eliminating the future problems of the typical foundation planting.

Serving cart wheels an entire meal from kitchen to pavilion. urs has an upper platform folded on itself, hinged along one ge; the top deck flips back, doubles the carrying surface. etal-mesh basket beneath carries silverware, small etceteras.

Handsome round barbecue brazier lets the whole rty draw closer to the fire on a chilly evening. inged grates on top fold back for easy fueling, cleaning.

Protected, private—but not hemmed in. Even the terrace view has staggered fences, planting between, with no feeling of barrier.

. . . With a living room planned for long life

The living room is designed, as is the rest of the house, for a long life. Furnishings are impervious to hard use. Colors are as easy to live with as a cheerful spouse. The placement of the room itself in the general floor plan makes for longevity.

It is, for one thing, a secluded room, a room for gentle leisure and meditation and even for solitude—all virtues growing rarer in current homes and current tempo. It can be closed off, need never be used for transit or entered by the casual caller-at-the-door. Added to that, the living room, between bedrooms and the more inhabited family room, preserves an in-between zone of quiet in the house. With all its privacy, it seems in no way to close in on its occupants. Its outdoor view of trees and sky and its calm interior make it seem larger than its 12'3" x 19'5" dimensions. It has its own entry-exit to terrace, plus its hall entry. Next to it is the kitchen-family room, so that tea can be brought in or a late plate of sandwiches served as spontaneously as the idea occurs. When the family room is overflowing, a husband and wife and friends can always retire to the quiet retreat this room promises.

Its color scheme is pure white and colors of Far Eastern brilliance—Oriental red, Ming yellow, porcelain blue—pools of pleasure to the eye against the dark polished floor. All furnishings are, of course, scaled to the size of the room. A rug makes the fireside area self-contained and leaves half the floor gleaming, serving effectively as a divider, and, again, adding a sense of spaciousness. A husband will like the price tags of practical furnishings classic enough to belong to no passing style. A wife's eyes will light on the fact that daily upkeep of the room will take only minutes, a factor not to be overlooked by one who does her own housework in an ample home.

LIVING-ROOM NEWS

- New: the walnut cabinet banded in silver-bright magnesium, topped in white plastic, an heirloom of tomorrow with its meeting of mellow wood and modern-marvel fittings to withstand wear.

- Handsome: a bamboo-and-rattan fan chair, favorite for generations, here in teak finish, foam-cushioned, to be ultimately today's.
- We show a black-and-brass grate. Or consider here the use of an Oriental hibachi, a black iron grill of fireplace size.
- In accessories, the accent is on purity of line and color—lamps of clear amethyst glass, a blue-and-white porcelain ginger box, a white Ming vase. Or substitute brilliant modern ceramics.

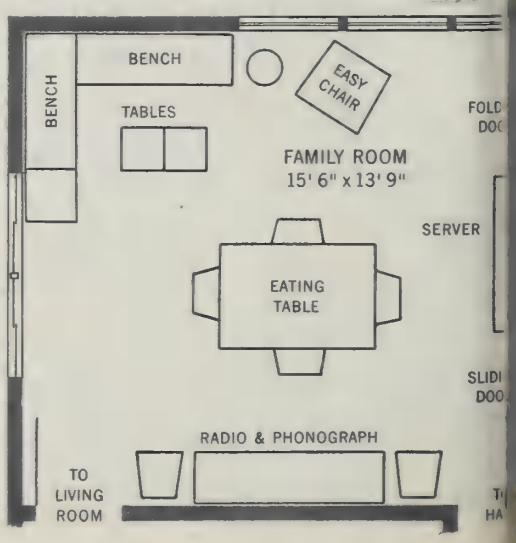
ANTIQUE BRONZE ACCESSORIES FROM YAMANAKA

White wood fireplace wall, candle sconces of slender iron, black slate hearth are foils for brilliant fabrics. Fan chair is cushioned in striped Siamese silk, sofa in red cotton and rayon, tub chairs in a fabric that merges durable linen and lustrous silk.

Airy family room opens on screened patio. Walls are covered in plastic fabric. Family vacation photographs hang on chrome holders behind couch. Louvered-design blinds give privacy, can be whisked clean by vacuum cleaner.



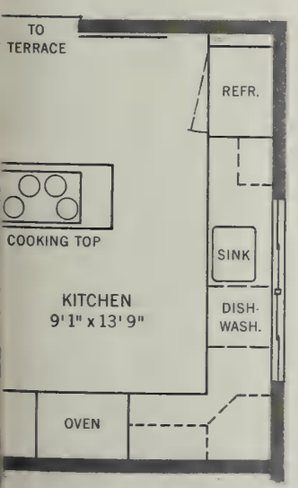
Chest houses radio, record player, discs. TV is portable. Close by are dictionary and reference books, so room can be used for homework.

. . . With family room completely separate

In our plan, two rooms function as one here. The family room and kitchen flow together so easily that the arrangement has the advantage of one large room. No idea could be more practical for the home with children, as we shall soon explain. Yet at the same time the two rooms can separate, so that when the family is grown the room above becomes a dining room and takes on greater formality.

As it stands now, we call it the family room, for its adaptability to the needs of children of all ages. A mother who cooks or a teen-age daughter who hostesses is never cut off from household or social activities—but she can be if she wants to be. A center partition between the two rooms is made up of serving counter with pass-through. A folding door extends at one end of the server, a sliding door at the other. Whether the space functions open or closed, snacks are always easy to prepare, meals easy to serve and the disorder of cooking is shielded from view.

Note the family room's advantages as a gathering spot. It takes hard wear off the living room. It has space for homework, music, games and parties. Teens can move back the table, dance at evening on the blue-and-white floor of durable plastic tile; radio and record player are nearby. Everything cleans. Even the big wall bench is impervious to stains made by the son who tinkers with a car—its pillows are washable plastic in misty green, blue and pinks. Coffee tables in front of it are topped in mosaic tile. The dining table is plastic—a durable surface for puzzles, chess, or the making of Dagwood specials. Through hardest use, colors stay fresh—and the care is minimal.



Today you live in the house with husband and growing children, and likely the sliding door and folding door are kept open. Tomorrow the kitchen an become the separate omain of the cook, and the amily room matures racefully into a dining room.

With a unique double-L arrangement of essentials, as shown in floor-plan sketch, the kitchen is a pleasure to cook in. All the important areas are grouped to save steps, but still the room is spacious, with no obstructions, with freeways of walking area. The appliances are all electric and built-in, and every one has counter space to neighbor it. All the surface cooking is arranged in a peninsula which connects to the room divider so hot foods can be served really hot into the family room, and a counter extends from it to hold serving dishes or to house a work chair or tall stool.

In location, the room saves steps too. The 6′ wide window over the sink faces the front of the house so that a woman at work can preview the caller about to drop in, or the mail or delivery man arriving. Just beyond the rear door of the kitchen is the carport, a short carrying trip when groceries are brought in from the car. And the kitchen opens directly onto the terrace as well. A slightly inclined ramp from kitchen door to patio floor aids the barbecue giver, because serving carts and portable cooking units can be wheeled out to the grounds. On the other hand, incoming traffic from carport or terrace can be directed to the family room just as well, so that when the kitchen is busy it needn't be interrupted, another advantage of our two-way teamwork of the rooms.

KITCHEN NEWS

- Built-in appliance center, 12″ high, 12″ wide, has plenty of power behind it for using five appliances at once. Three outlets can be connected to the electric clock for automatic operation—fine for making coffee for early risers or to have it ready for after the movies.
- Built-in oven is 24″ wide inside, giving extra capacity for large and hospitable families, and its size allows, too, for baking double batches of any meal for rainy-day storage in the freezer.
- Refrigerator stacks on top of freezer at arm height. These two units combined have 13 cubic feet of storage and use a space only 34″ wide.
- New hard plastic counter tops have a miniature flower design in beguiling clover pink.

Cooking hood is revolutionary, developed for submarines—activated charcoal frees air of odors, rustless grease trap can be cleaned in dishwasher, no outer ducts are needed, and it's sturdy enough to double as shelf for extra mixing bowls.

SEWING-GUEST

With sewing machine folded into walnut chest, cutting table cleared, sewing room is serene for guests or as a family quiet spot. Books and radio and light for bed reading are hospitably ready for the aunt or school friend who visits.

LAUNDRY-STORAGE

Washer and dryer in vertical arrangement take up space just 25" wide. Cupboards hold soaps. Cabinets above store luggage. Linen cupboard is at right (not shown). A splitwood blind can close off all laundry area when not in use.

. . . With double-duty rooms on each level

Each of these rooms—one in the basement, one on the first floor, one on the top floor—serves more than one purpose in our home.

Above we show a sewing and guest room on the top story. Sewing work spreads roomily, with machine under a wide window, a plastic-topped table nearby with drop leaf to serve as a cutting surface, supplies all handy. But when a guest arrives, work hides away and even Jennie (the model) finds closet space under the sloping roof.

The laundry-storage area at right backs up to the first floor bathroom and takes some strain off that room. Part of counter lifts to reveal a sink that catches the drip of garments washed by hand or, with mirror above, is a primping spot.

The basement space, shown below, is not only home for an oil-burning air conditioner but can also hold a full-scale hobby area—for ceramics, woodworking, weaving, silverwork—now, or in our home's steadily mellowing future.

UTILITY-HOBBY

At foot of stairs in basement a year-round air conditioner gives clean coolness or heat to order. Whole temperature "plant" takes up little space, leaves room for a tool shop or, here, a pottery studio.

IDEAS FOR HOME-BUILDERS

- A hall location for a laundry has great merit—it's a midway point to collect soiled clothes. New appliances like the aqua-colored twosome here are good-looking enough to be used almost anywhere in the house.
- When building, lighting is easier to install earlier than later. In guest room, fixture was built in behind valance board connecting bookcases. In laundry, a ceiling fixture was recessed into the storage unit. In the basement, lighting was placed among the ceiling rafters.
- For areas below ground level, special floor covering is needed. (Ask when you buy.) In basement we use red tile of vinyl asbestos—suitable, snug and safe for cellar use.
- Textured wall covering was chosen for both laundry (in white to make a dark corner lighter) and guest room (in soft pink to give a subtle background). The plastic-coated fabric comes 24" wide and is put up on thoroughly dry walls with a special paste. Material is hardy, holds its color after many scrubbings.

Hundreds of thousands of wives are struggling, in a halfhearted and futile way, to slim when they ought to begin by improving their marriages. They are caught in a vicious circle: Their marriages are impaired by their overweight, so they overeat to solace themselves for their marital unhappiness, thereby making their marriages still worse. We have had to deal with this problem continually during more than 27 years at the American Institute of Family Relations, and are now using group counseling very successfully. Eight or ten women working together with a counselor, once a week, may make as rapid progress as if each were working alone. Apart from a very few women whose difficulties are due to glandular or other physical defect, no wife need jeopardize her marital happiness by being too fat—and surveys show that if a wife becomes more than 20 pounds overweight, her happiness is likely to be reduced. The counselor in this case was Mrs. Mary Wilson.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "Last night I got upset and went on another eating binge. Clark hasn't made love to me in more than a month. Not that I blame him. How can a man feel genuine warmth for a woman as big as the side of a mountain?"

HE: "Abby and I have been married nine years. Her parents' influence still surpasses my own. Although Abby hasn't said so, my guess is she secretly disapproves of sex. Never in any way has she indicated she wants my love."

ABBY TELLS HER SIDE:

"I'm what's wrong with my marriage," said Abby, who was twenty-six and had beautiful skin, hair and eyes. The counselor's office was warm, but Abby sat huddled in a shapeless, bulky coat that further increased her size. "I'm five feet seven. I weigh a hundred and ninety-five pounds, and should weigh eighty pounds less. Yet last night I broke my latest diet again. I ate six eggs, four pieces of bread and half a cake, topped off with two quarts of milk. I just couldn't control my appetite.

"With me it seems to be a matter of all or nothing. I can live for weeks skipping breakfast, having a grapefruit for lunch and two lamb chops or a small steak for dinner. Our three young sons seem to be eating every waking minute—our oldest boy must bang the refrigerator door a hundred times a day—and by six P.M. I usually feel as though I were starving and am so irritable I could scream. However, I can steel myself and resist the daily temptation of watching the boys gobble peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches, cookies and the kinds of sweets I adore. Then suddenly I get upset over something and go on an eating binge. I get upset easily. Too easily. I've always been supersensitive.

"My husband doesn't work Saturday and Sunday nights—Clark is a C.P.A. who does a great deal of work in the evenings—and yesterday afternoon he suggested we do our major marketing for the week and then take in a movie. Clark and I dropped off the youngsters with my parents, as is customary on our evenings out. I'm an only child myself and there is nothing my parents won't do for me. They are wild about our three boys. Clark and I certainly have no baby-sitting problems. When our gang trooped into my parents' house last night, both my mother and I noticed that Andy—he is our oldest—was wearing a torn pair of pants. I was both humiliated and furious. While I was helping the little boys with their buttons, Andrew had whined for me to help him. When I refused, he dashed into the garage so he could be first in the car; he had not only managed to tear his pants, he had got them filthy with grease. I almost believed he'd done it on purpose. One time Andy deliberately left a sixty-five-dollar bicycle out in a violent rainstorm to pay me back for bathing his baby brother and telling him to bathe himself.

"Andrew is seven and plenty old enough to take care of his clothes; I'd dressed all three youngsters in their best outfits because I like my mother to be proud of her grandchildren. Andy behaves worse than either of the little boys and is twice as destructive and awkward. His clumsiness puts me in mind of myself at that age. I was overgrown too.

"My mother wouldn't let me discipline Andy. Among the three boys, he is her favorite. If I say 'no' to Andy she says 'yes,' and he grins like a Cheshire cat and knows which of us is the boss. Andy sometimes has bad spells of asthma and when he can't attend school—he has a high I.Q., but makes poor marks despite anything I say or do—my mother keeps him. Andy tells everybody he loves her better than he loves me.

"On the way to the shopping area I asked Clark whether he thought Marilyn Monroe was better-looking—some people say the bone structure of my face resembles hers. Clark insisted I was much better-looking and he swore he admired my figure, but I knew he was talking to cheer me up. The fact is my husband thinks I look awful.

"Five nights a week Clark doesn't arrive home until eleven P.M., and by then I'm likely to be sound asleep. Even if I am awake, he doesn't come into the bedroom. Instead he heads for the hobby room he built in a corner of the garage and stays until midnight or later. He collects stamps and stones and coins, does leatherwork and bird watching, is interested in magic and in learning to play the harmonica. I'm bitter and jealous of Clark's hobbies, I know. I can't help it.

"Clark hasn't made love to me in more than a month. Not that I blame him. How can a man feel genuine warmth for a woman as big as the side of a mountain?

"By the time we located a place in the parking area last night I was in tears, accusing Clark of preferring Marilyn Monroe to me, practically hating him for something that wasn't his fault. He went into the supermarket with the list and I flounced off in the opposite direction. There was a penny scale on the sidewalk outside the drugstore. I'm ashamed to admit it, but I habitually lie about my weight and the size dress I wear. It's almost unheard of for me to weigh myself in public—I lock the door before using our bathroom scales—but nobody was in sight. Just as I saw I hadn't lost an ounce and still weighed a hundred and ninety-five, I discovered Clark was standing right behind me staring at the arrow on the scales.

"By then the evening was completely ruined. I was too heartsick to go to any movie. We picked up the boys early. Knowing something was wrong and suspecting poor Clark, my mother tongue-lashed him and did her best to comfort me. She had mended Andy's pants and tightened the buttons on the little boys' shirts and persuaded Aunt Ida, who boards with my parents, to bake one of her cheesecakes. Both my aunt and my mother are inclined to be plump and I

91 pounds off—

"My dreams are coming true!"

At 214 pounds, life was a nightmare for Pierrette Lachapelle.
No dates, no decent job, no pretty clothes, no self-respect.
Then "Pete" realized she had to wake up before she could live. Here is her diet story as she has told it to us.

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN Beauty Editor of the Journal

Dear Journal: Two years ago I tipped the scales at a round, firm, unflattering 214 pounds. Today I weigh 123. In approximately ten months I went from a size 44 to a size 11 or 12. I am 25 years old, and am employed as a secretary by the state government.

Being a nice, normal size has made such a tremendous improvement in my life—physically, mentally, emotionally, socially, professionally—that I would like to share this wonderful experience with everyone. Your diet stories have helped so many people to better health, and certainly more pride and happiness. I believe my experience could also help some other "stylish stout" (how I loathe that expression!). Reducing opened up new horizons for me—I'd like to help do that for someone else.

Thank you for publishing a consistently fine magazine.

Sincerely,
PIERRETTE LACHAPELLE
West Warwick, Rhode Island

There is a saying that "A fat person is really a thin person in prison." When I was a fatty, the "prison" walls encircled my 214-pound, 5'3½" frame and closed down on my heart and my outlook on life.

I was twenty-two years old (Pumpkin Face) before I faced the fact that my misery was self-inflicted. And I realized only I could plan my escape. Parents can urge, friends can coax, doctors can warn, but it's the fatty herself who has to choose between gorging food and eating normally—and thus between heartbreak and happiness.

My decision to diet came on a gray day in February, 1953, when I was at work in the payroll office of a hospital for mental diseases. Caught up in the forlornness of my surroundings, I became suddenly conscious of the fact that I was part of the place. I had been an honor-roll student in high school and had had three years of college. Yet, because of my size, I was stuck in a dingy little job that could have been handled by any girl out of grade school. If I don't do something about my appearance, I'll never get out of here, I told myself. I'm going to diet!

That night, as my parents began their dinner with—as usual—a thick homemade soup, I ate a small broiled steak. As they progressed to meat, potatoes, gravy, buttered vegetables, I had a lettuce-and-tomato salad sprinkled with lemon juice. While they helped themselves to seconds on a rich pudding dessert, I finished my dinner with fruit and black coffee. "Pierrette, you'll starve," mother commiserated. "But Pete needs to reduce," daddy encouraged. He was so right.

Many ex-fatties say their only regret about dieting is not having done it sooner. I share this belief for several reasons. Mother has never seen me slim. About the time I started dieting, she began having critical trouble with her eyesight. Before I was halfway through, she had become totally blind. "Don't be sad for me, Pete," she insists, "I can picture how pretty you look—and I can hear the compliments."

When I was a child, teachers considered my singing voice "promising" and encouraged me to train and develop it. By the time I reached my teens, however, I was overwhelmingly self-conscious about my appearance. Whenever I did perform, other children would laugh at my monstrous figure stuffed into a matronly dress. And so I gave up my lessons and abandoned the idea of a singing career.

My excess weight cheated me out of achieving another ambition, which was to become a teacher. When I graduated from high school, I enrolled at the College of Education in Providence, Rhode Island. In the second year, part of my course included serving as a student teacher. I couldn't do it. A 200-pound-plus girl looks comical and feels ridiculous romping with youngsters. What's more, it was a physical impossibility for me to keep up with their lively activities. Again, I gave up.

PIERRETTE'S REDUCING DIET—TYPICAL WEEK (Approximately 900 calories a day)

Editor's Note: Although milk is occasionally included in her diet, Pierrette did not get at least one pint a day, which the JOURNAL considers essential, especially for young people. We suggest to readers who have their doctor's approval of dieting, and who plan to use "Pete's" diet as a guide, that you include two 8-ounce glasses of nonfat milk in your daily eating plan. This will be adding approximately 170 calories to the total daily calorie count. "Pete's" diet, with the inclusion of the milk, is a nutritious reducing diet of approximately 1100 calories a day.

Eighteen years old, 214 pounds. Girls liked me (I wasn't any competition) but boys never formed a line at the door. This party dress was for photographic purposes—as a fatty, I never had a date

FRANCESCO SCAVULLO

Here is a totally unretouched photograph of "Pete" as she looks today at 123 pounds. Pete's post-diet career combined with a lively social life keep her busy around the clock—and have successfully canceled out that old desire for too much food.

I had no dates. I was too fat to enjoy athletics. I adored pretty clothes, but they didn't come in my size. The only time I could take my mind off my lonely, pointless life was at mealtime or when I was eating between meals.

Once a friend of mine did persuade me to go to her Halloween party. When I arrived, her home was swarming with cheerful young people. Warmed by such a gala atmosphere, I had almost forgotten my self-consciousness about my appearance, when someone suggested going on a scavenger hunt before having the party refreshments. The girls and boys paired off in couples and streamed out the door. In the excitement, I had been ignored and forgotten. Tearfully I prepared the table, made the coffee and had the ice cream and cake ready for their return. It was a miserable ending to what I had hoped might be a happy evening.

I lost 13 pounds before I went to our family doctor and told him of my determination to stick to my diet. He was happy for me and eager to help. He gave me a calorie chart on which he checked the foods I should include in my diet each day—and double-checked the rich, fried, fattening foods I must avoid. My daily calorie allotment was to be approximately 900 calories, and I was to report back to the doctor each week for a physical checkup. In ten months I reduced to 123 pounds.

During my diet I exercised for fifteen minutes each night before bedtime. My favorite exercise is one which can be done at any time, standing, sitting, lying down. All it involves is s-l-o-w-l-y pulling in your abdominal muscles, then s-l-o-w-l-y relaxing them. I'm sure I did this at least 100 times a day, and believe it is the exercise most responsible for helping me keep a firm, flat tummy!

People who hadn't seen me during my diet didn't recognize me. One afternoon, my Cousin Eddie took me to a clambake being attended by an assortment of relatives and friends. An aunt and uncle nudged each other as Eddie and I appeared and quickly spread a rumor that "Eddie has a new girl." Guests, including many who had known me all my life, gathered around to be introduced to the "stranger"!

On the day I was a bridesmaid at a friend's wedding, I wore a waltz-length white dress with a wide red satin sash—in a size 12! Feeling thrilled but shy on the occasion of my first big social event, I stood a little away from the group of people surrounding the bride and groom when I heard an attractive usher say to the boy next to him, "I'd like to meet that pretty little girl in the corner." With a rush of pleasure I realized he was speaking of me. No boy had ever before asked to meet me, much less called me pretty!

At 123 pounds I can shop for pretty clothes without steeling myself against a salesgirl's indifference or scorn. I can accept invitations happily and with confidence. I love to dance, to swim, to play tennis—things I could never have done as a fatty.

After I had reduced to 123 pounds, I continued to use my diet as a basic eating plan, gradually adding to it. Nowadays, I top off my salad with a small amount of oil dressing, or I have an extra vegetable at dinner, or a custard or gelatin dessert. Very occasionally I have a yen for something rich—a slice of chocolate cake, a sweet roll at breakfast. I still weigh myself faithfully each week, and if I find I have added two or three pounds, I cut out the extras until they have disappeared.

As for work, I am no longer hiding away in a dingy little office. In fact, just recently I have been promoted to the job of "administrative assistant" to my boss. Pardon me if I am sounding very, very grand. It's just that I feel that way too! END

AMERICAN DESIGNERS

These four designers have the creative spark, the gift of color and youngness, and their clothes have "that certain look"
which is especially American.
They believe in simplicity, in suiting the fashion to the woman, and in clothes that are easy to live in.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

NORMAN NORELL

"The greatest compliment a woman can receive about her costume is to have someone say, 'What a wonderful way to look.' rather than, 'What a beautiful dress you are wearing.' This means the woman and her dress have blended. therefore she is truly well dressed. A woman should be very aware of every detail she is wearing. but wear them all in a completely unaware manner. This is poise. sophistication and elegance."

CLARE POTTER

"The best-dressed women are generally the most uncluttered and simply dressed. We find this same refinement of taste in all the arts—therefore your clothes and the wearing of them reflect very revealingly your expression of personality and taste. I think my first rule for dressing well is to dress to fit the occasion, and then to dress in the most becoming fashion to fit your own particular style."

SOPHIE GIMBEL

"Women should look lovely—and ladylike—and fashions should be keyed to their lives. For ideas, I watch American women to see how they want to look at work, at home, dancing, shopping or spending the day in town—then design clothes as flattering, feminine, functional and as long-lasting as I can possibly make them. I am convinced that fine clothes gain ease and a special chic the longer they are worn."

JAMES GALANOS

"Good fashion emanates from no one place—a well-designed dress should be wearable anywhere in the world and right in any locale. I believe that fashion itself becomes subdued and the personality of the wearer comes through. I rely on brilliant and beautiful fabrics and cut rather than exaggeration or tricks. Simplicity and purity of line are the basis of all good design—these are my working tools."

NORMAN NORELL

PHOTOGRAPHS BY CECIL BEATON

Norman Norell puts chalk-blue wool, fresh as a spring sky, into one of his flawless little suits with the beautiful shoulders, well-turned collar and stalk slenderness for which he is famous. The fabric has a rough, linen texture. The buttons are crystal. Adolfo designed the matching blue felt hat. Sapphire-and-diamond pin is by Seaman Schepps.

CLARE POTTER

Clare Potter with her characteristic love of color designs a flame-red knitted-wool suit to be worn with an Indian printed-silk blouse in shades of red and gold. This is a casual fashion with the easy jacket that is so wearable and so loved by women in the U.S.A. The big rough straw hat is by John Frederics; jeweled pin, by Verdura.

Norman Norell believes that the well-cut wool skirt and silk shirtwaist worn with a matching straight-line coat is one of the smartest and most useful costumes an American woman can own. This one is sand-beige wool, worn with a felt hat by Adolfo, calfskin belt, shoes and handbag. The bracelet is gold; the gloves, white doeskin.

NORMAN NORELL

JAMES GALANOS

James Galanos has the imagination to combine bouffant white organdy with a little charcoal-gray wool-jersey jacket—eternally young. The top of the dress is embroidered organdy, strapless, the jacket is double-breasted. Worn with short gloves. Coiffeurs by Enrico Caruso.

Sophie believes that a woman's clothes should be feminine first of all, and for many years she has been known for her beautiful afternoon and evening chiffons. This year she has designed one in bright green. The scarf may be worn floating or tied in front. Emerald necklace by Seaman Schepps.

REPORT

• Suits look like a brand-new fashion, worn with wide-brimmed hats of rough straw or starchy leghorn that transfer easily to afternoon silks. Gray flannel makes a new appearance, often with brass buttons, and everybody loves it. The shoulders are small, the waistline never pinched. Jackets are scaled shorter and the skirt with pleats moves gracefully into fashion, looking fresh and young.

• The casual fashion is right everywhere you see it—the suit with a straight jacket, the skirt-and-coat costume, the three-quarter coat, the brimmed felt hat. Its fabrics are flannels, tweeds, surah silks, linen weaves.

The pale tweed coat has become a basic in beige and pastels. The silk coat is a city fashion, black or bright, tunic-length or hem-length. Printed-silk dresses have their own matching coats, giving them news and importance. White piqué, looking fresher than ever, is buttoned in oftener than ever in bibs, collars, weskits. Polka dots are late-day fashions in chiffon, and deep-back dinner dresses. Shorter sleeves are coming—longer gloves, more-sizable bags.

WHAT DO YOU MAKE OF A PRINT

A soft flattering brim with an open crown, Journal pattern No. 2899*. Gloves, Journal pattern No. 2900*.

This spring you might make a slim coat or even a hat—prints are everywhere. Some are silk, some are cotton and many are sheer. There are stripes, there are borders and an abundance of florals. One of the prettiest fashions is the sheer flowered shirtwaist dress. Another, a sweater trimmed with a print to match a dress. Unexpected fashion for a print is a coat worn over a plain-colored dress, or a bright print cotton hat with a simple dark dress. You will wear these bright prints from now through summer Carolyn, Florence and Dorothy Lee, daughters in this month's How America Lives family, helped us select these fabrics and we photographed each in her favorite print.

SHARLAND

CONCLUSION

Before the commissaire left he assured me that he was perfectly satisfied my wife had fallen accidentally from the window. He asked me to call on him in Villars the following day. Only the lawyer now remained, and he had the grace to apologize for his presence. "I only stayed, monsieur," he said, "because I understand, from the conversation I have had with your brother, that he knew nothing whatsoever of the terms of the new Carvalet contract. I thought perhaps a few words now might clarify the position."

"Nothing will clarify the position," I said, "except for my brother to read it, which he is at liberty to do whenever he pleases. I have it upstairs in my dressing room."

Paul hesitated. "I'm sorry to be persistent, especially at this moment," he said, "but you can hardly blame me. From what Maître Talbert has been telling me, the new contract differs from the old on the only vital points. Does that mean everything you told Jacques and me on your return from Paris was a lie?"

"Yes," I said.

"What's that to do with you?" interrupted his mother. "Jean owns the verrerie. He had a perfect right to make what arrangements he pleased."

"I try to direct it, don't I?" said Paul. "God knows it's always been a thankless task. But why should Jean lie? What was the point of making fools of us all?"

"I didn't want to make fools of you," I said. "I thought it was the only way to save the verrerie. I changed my mind after I came back from Paris. Don't ask me why. You wouldn't understand."

"How did you think you were going to raise the capital?" asked Paul. "Talbert says that under the new terms it would mean running the verrerie at a complete loss."

"I don't know. I hadn't thought."

"Monsieur was hoping for an heir?" suggested the lawyer. "No doubt that is why he confided the matter to Madame Jean de Gué? Of course, as things have turned out ——"

He stopped. Discretion overwhelmed him. The comtesse stared at him from her chair beside the fire.

"Well?" she said. "Finish your sentence, maître. As things have turned out—what?"

The lawyer spoke apologetically to me. "I am sure it is no secret to anyone of the family, monsieur, that under the terms of the marriage settlement you come into a considerable fortune on the death of your wife."

"No secret at all," I said.

"So that in point of fact," the lawyer continued, "whether the terms of the Carvalet contract are favorable or unfavorable, it doesn't matter so very much. Increase of capital will cover the loss."

Nobody seemed to have noticed, or even cared, that Marie-Noël was seated on a stool beside her grandmother, and was listening intently to the conversation.

"Does Monsieur Talbert mean that papa gets some money after all?" she said. "I thought he only got money if I had a brother."

"Be quiet," said her grandmother.

"Yes," said Paul slowly, "I suppose we did know that. But it's not one of the things people discuss in a family. Naturally, every one of us was hoping my sister-in-law would have a son."

The lawyer said nothing.

Paul turned to me. "I'm sorry," he said, "but if you don't mind, I still think it's only fair to me if I see the contract."

I threw the bunch of keys on the table. "It's in the valise in the wardrobe. Go and find it, if you like."

Marie-Noël jumped to her feet. "I'll find it," she said, seizing the keys. She was out of the room before anyone thought of stopping her.

"Really, Paul," said Renée, "you're being very inconsiderate. As Maître Talbert says, the position is changed now, because of poor Françoise's death, and I hardly think this is the moment to start talking business. It makes me feel extremely uncomfortable, and it must be very painful for Jean."

"It's painful for the whole family," said Paul. "I don't want the verrerie to benefit because of Françoise. I hate being made a fool of that's all."

Maître Talbert was ill-at-ease. "I apologize," he said. "I would not have mentioned the matter had I known there was this unfortunate misunderstanding between you as to the terms. Naturally, I am at your disposal, monsieur," he said to me, "for a full discussion of this and other matters at any time convenient to you after the funeral."

"The funeral will be on Friday," said the comtesse. "I have already arranged it with Monsieur le Curé. My daughter-in-law will be brought home tomorrow and will lie here during Wednesday and Thursday, so that our friends and everyone in the district will have time to pay their respects. I shall of course receive them." The lawyer bowed. "You will have the kindness, maître, to see that notification of the death goes to the newspapers this evening. I have written the notices myself." She took some sheets of paper from her lap, and handed them to him.

The sound of Marie-Noël running down the stairs and across the hall could be heard through the door.

"Not so much noise, child," said the comtesse as she burst into the room. "One should tread softly in a house of mourning."

Marie-Noël went straight to Paul and gave him the document.

"Have I your permission?" he asked, glancing at me.

"Naturally," I said.

For a while there was no sound except the rustling of paper as Paul turned the crisp pages of the contract. Then he turned to me.

"You realize," he said, his voice expressionless, betraying nothing of what he must have felt, "that this contract goes against all we agreed to before you went to Paris?"

"Yes," I said.

"You've signed the duplicate and returned it to them?"

"I signed it in the office on Saturday, and posted it on the way home."

"Then there's nothing more to be done. As maman says, you own the business, you can make what terms you please. It just means that, as far as I am concerned, trying to run it for you becomes impossible."

He stood up and handed me back the contract. His frustrated, harassed face looked suddenly old and tired.

"Heaven knows I don't pretend to have brains," he said, "but if I had gone to Paris I could have done better than that."

For a moment no one spoke. Then the comtesse reached for the bell beside the fire. "I think," she said, "that we needn't detain Maître Talbert any longer. A prolonged discussion on the future of the verrerie is quite out of place at the present time. And I am sure that he must have plenty to do in Villars, as we have here in the château."

The lawyer shook hands with all of us and followed Gaston from the room.

The comtesse turned to me. "You look tired, Jean," she said. "You've had a long, emotional day. Why not have a rest? You have just an hour before we go to church."

"To church?" asked Renée. "Is there an Office?"

"An Office? Of course there is an Office. Didn't you hear me arrange it with CONTINUED ON PAGE 108

In an Elegant Setting. Our party becomes a buffet distinguished enough for diplomats, or a golden-wedding celebration, when the delicious chicken and lobster is served from an old silver chafing dish. Your favorite linens and china (those blue-and-white Worcester plates!) look their most glamorous. The creamy coconut-sherbet dessert is molded to perfection in a snowy ring; jeweled with red, juicy strawberries. This is a combination of flavors you and your guests will remember!

Fireside Buffet. Our magical menu becomes a Sunday-night supper (or perhaps you're having two tables of bridge) when you spread a turquoise cloth over a table in front of the warm fire. Your chicken and sea food keeps piping hot in an earthenware casserole, in an insulating basket holder. There is a tray of corn sticks; the turquoise-and-white plates are plastic (and how beautiful they are!). This time perhaps you'll skip the dessert, because it's late, but there's a big pot of hot coffee waiting on a tea wagon nearby.

Informal Party, Family Style. Could a menu be more adaptable? This is possible too—to bake your corn bread in a ring, fill with the delectable chicken and sea food, and serve it family style, at the dinner table, with the host or hostess doing the honors. The dining table is set with rough green straw mats, the plates are pink-and-green pottery, the mood is casual. This time you'll omit the first course for the sake of easy service, but there'll be salad, and that heavenly dessert!

superb dinner served 3 ways

Here's a really all-out superb dinner, one that's guaranteed to make you a hostess remembered for fine taste and fine cooking. No passing fancies here. All these dishes will be treasured and served time and again, adaptable to whatever sort of party you're in the mood to give—formal to most informal. Our main dish is a triumph—the happiest possible marriage of chicken and tender sea food! A golden sauce, rich with chicken stock and luscious coral chunks of lobster, sweet-tasting scallops and shrimp. Corn bread is perfect with this; or nutty wild rice, buttered, and laced with onion salt—it's another happy thought for this menu. For the salad bowl, "crisp leaf of the lettuce shall glitter, and cress from the rivulet's bed"—tossed in a fine, spicy French dressing. The perfect ending is our heavenly coconut "frozen velvet," cold and refreshing, filled with plump strawberries. There's hospitality in the air, in March, and good food is the mark of a good party—plus the glowing feeling that comes from hearing, "I've had such a wonderful time, thank you so much!"

Gay halves of grapefruit and steaming oatmeal laced with plump raisins and crunchy pecans or walnuts start a stick-to-the-ribs Sunday breakfast. Delicious as it is decorative—the golden omelet with frizzled ham can have a filling of marinated avocado for a special occasion. Add a hot bread and coffee unlimited.

Families all over the land are rediscovering the special companionship of an early-morning gathering around the breakfast table. Particularly at this time of year when the wind blows chill and the snow piles high in the hedgerows, nothing tastes so good or makes everyone feel so cozy as big bowls of steaming-hot oatmeal with cream. Skimpy breakfasts are out of date, or didn't you know? It's energy you need for extra bounce to carry you through until lunchtime. And oatmeal will give it to you!

Here are half a dozen different ways to serve oatmeal for breakfast, and a new oatmeal diet breakfast that stays with you and adds up to only 221 calories.

1. Cook chopped, pitted dates, dried figs, apricots or cooked, pitted prunes with the oatmeal. No other sweetening needed.

2. Top with jam, marmalade, molasses or maple sirup on occasion.

3. Lace with plumped raisins and chopped pecans or walnuts as we did in the photo above.

4. From time to time serve oatmeal with brown sugar and sour cream.

Choose a favorite from the cereal buffet—or a medley—to crown with fruit and eat with country cream.

5. And for Sunday breakfast, serve the oatmeal in individual casseroles—top with heavy cream—sprinkle with brown sugar and put under moderate broiler heat until sugar bubbles.

6. Sweetened fruits—fresh, frozen or canned—sliced bananas, strawberries, sliced peaches—whatever you happen to have on hand—lend variety as toppers to the oatmeal bowl the year round.

Low-Calorie-Diet Breakfast: One half cup grapefruit juice, one soft-cooked egg, one half cup hot oatmeal with one quarter cup skim milk and one teaspoon honey, and black coffee.

More Cereal Capers Clever the mother who surprises her family with sautéed farina or corn-meal-mush slices with maple sirup. Cook and refrigerate the farina or mush first. . . . Add several tablespoons of molasses or honey to a granular wheat cereal during cooking. . . . And top each dish of cereal flakes or crisp rice cereal with a cinnamon apple ring. . . . Another time, pour chilled strawberry or prune yoghurt over dry cereal in place of milk or cream. Use the containers of fruit-flavored yoghurt or stir strawberry jam or strained prunes into plain yoghurt.

Breadbasket Bounty Pass tiny hot muffins with a spoonful of blackberry or red-currant jelly or jam baked inside each one. . . . A cheese-flake biscuit ring should prove astonishingly popular. Brush twenty packaged unbaked buttermilk biscuits with melted butter and dip in finely grated sharp Cheddar cheese. Stack the circles together, edges down, in a well-greased ring mold. Bake in a hot oven, 425° F., about twenty minutes, or until nicely browned. Turn out and serve at once. . . . Here are two more good hot breads to serve with coffee:

Sugar-Plum Cinnamon Rolls: Place the contents of one package unbaked cinnamon rolls on a greased baking sheet. Form a hollow in the top of each roll and fill indentation with a pitted cooked prune. Sprinkle with sugar. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for eighteen to twenty minutes. Remove from pan immediately. Serve hot.

Stir-and-Roll Scones: In a bowl, sift together two cups flour, one tablespoon baking powder, two tablespoons sugar and one half teaspoon salt. Add one half cup chopped pitted dates and mix into the dry flour mixture. Beat two egg yolks and one egg white. Add one fourth cup salad oil and one fourth cup heavy cream to the eggs. Add to the dry ingredients. Mix with a fork for fifteen strokes. Turn out on a floured board and knead ten turns. Divide dough in half. Roll between sheets of waxed paper to one half inch thickness. Cut into triangles, twelve to a circle. Brush tops with the remaining egg white and sprinkle with sugar. Bake on an ungreased baking sheet in a hot oven, 425° F., for ten to twelve minutes. Makes twenty-four biscuits.

". . . Surely in the morning of the world there must have been bacon and eggs and marmalade. Else why did the first sleeper waken?"

T. EARLE WELBY

Hot Off the Griddle Take a whirl at a batch of fluffy griddlecakes, evenly browned waffles or French toast, and eight-o'clock spirits are sure to soar high. There's nothing quite like a jug of warm maple sirup with any of these, but for adventure's sake ladle fruited cheese over hot waffles. Just soften cream cheese with a little sirup from sweetened fruit or berries. Then fold in some of the fruit. Or when waffle batter is in the mixing stage, you can stir in drained whole-kernel corn and chopped crisp bacon for fun and flavor. . . . Have you discovered that cheese bread and raisin bread make excellent French toast? Give it crunch with a coating of dry cereal flakes just before sizzling on the griddle. . . . Light as eiderdown, these Perfection Pancakes would put a sparkle in anyone's eyes: Mix together until smooth a half cup pancake mix, a half cup corn-muffin mix, two slightly beaten eggs, one tablespoon melted shortening and three fourths cup milk. Bake on a hot griddle, turning once. Cook until golden brown on both sides. Makes about twelve four-inch pancakes. Serve with grilled Canadian bacon or sausages.

Rainbow of Fruit Following church some Sunday, try a switch on the fruit course at brunch by serving a fragrant compote after the entree. One simple yet ambrosial trio is canned black cherries, canned peaches and canned figs heated together with a dash of cinnamon. And remember these equally delectable mélanges:

Hot Fruit Compote: Section two oranges. Mix with one No. 2^1_2 can whole apricots and one No. 2^1_2 can greengage plums in a large skillet or—for glamour—a chafing dish. Add one tablespoon shredded orange peel. Simmer until fruits are heated through. Flavor with one half teaspoon almond extract and one tablespoon lemon juice. If you have a chafing dish, this is the time to use it.

Baked Bananas and Plums: Peel and cut four bananas in half lengthwise. Place in a shallow baking dish. Sprinkle with one teaspoon grated lemon rind and one or two tablespoons lemon juice. Drain one No. 2^1_2 can purple plums and reserve one cup sirup. Pit plums and arrange over bananas. Pour sirup over all and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for twenty minutes. Serve warm or chilled as you prefer.

PABLO PICASSO (1881–

The first fifty years of the twentieth century may well be called in future histories of art the "Age of Picasso." Rarely in history has one man so completely dominated and guided the course of art for so long as this fantastically gifted Spaniard. Styles may change, "isms" may come and go, but at the crest of every wave since 1906, Pablo Picasso, smiling, his tongue in his cheek perhaps, rides with the self-assurance which only real genius can give.

When he painted this picture he was scarcely twenty years old, having recently arrived in Paris, the focal point of art during the early twentieth century. His first exhibition of pictures (painted at the same time Monsieur le Curé? We go at half past six for a special Mass for Françoise. After that we shall all drive into Villars to the mortuary chapel."

She fumbled for the spectacles hanging beside the crucifix on her bosom, and began to scribble names and addresses on sheets of paper.

I went outside and stood in the grounds beyond the moat. The cattle had come to pasture, and the sun had dipped behind the trees. Soon the mist would rise, encompassing the château, and already, with shutters drawn and windows closed, it stood remote from the evening world, from the jackdaws massing in the woods and the black-and-white cattle cropping the grass.

Paul came and joined me on the terrace. For a moment or two he smoked a cigarette in silence, then nervously he threw it away, saying abruptly:

"I meant what I said just now."

"What did you say?" I asked.

"That it was impossible to run the verrerie for you any more."

"What's your reason?" I asked.

"My reason?" He stared down into the moat. "We've never got on: you know that. You asked me to run the verrerie for you because nobody else would take it on after Maurice was shot, and you were too idle yourself. I did it for the sake of the family, not for you. At least, up to date, I've respected your business judgment, if nothing else. Now I can't even do that."

His voice, resentful, bitter, sounded as though he had lost all faith, not only in his work but in himself; as if what he had striven to do through the years had come to no account, the purpose gone.

"Supposing," I said slowly, "that in future I rely upon your business judgment, not you on mine?"

"What do you mean?"

"You said in the salon that you had no brains," I said, "but that nevertheless, if you had gone to Paris, you could have done better than I did. You're right; you could have. Suppose, in the future, you take on that part of the business—travel, get the orders, go to Paris, London, get fresh contacts, meet people, go all over the world if you like—while I stay here?"

He straightened himself and looked at me, puzzled, unbelieving. "Are you serious?"

"Yes," I answered. Then, because he looked doubtful still, "Don't you want to travel? Don't you want to get away?"

His laugh was short, mirthless. "Naturally I want to get away. I always have. But there was never the money, nor the opportunity. Nor did you ever make it possible for me."

"I can make it possible for you now," I said.

Constraint, that had for the moment vanished, came near to us again. He looked away from me. "Because you've come into a fortune you're going to play benefactor; is that it?" he asked.

"I hadn't thought of it that way," I said. "It just struck me, suddenly, that your life hasn't been an easy one. I'm sorry."

"It's rather late for regrets after all these years."

"Perhaps. You still haven't answered my question."

"You mean," he said, "that you'd give me a free hand to travel in Europe, or even America, visiting other factories, other small plants like ours, seeing how it is possible to keep going under similar conditions by using more up-to-date methods, so that at the end of six months or so, when I get back, we might incorporate them here at St. Gilles?"

The voice, which had been bitter and resentful, was suddenly interested, alert; and I, who had thought out none of the things he suggested, realized that unwittingly I had stumbled upon an idea that would give his life new meaning. Instead of seeing himself as the younger brother, put upon, overburdened, he would be transformed into the one who made decisions, bringing fresh life to what had been decayed and dying, thereby saving both tradition and himself.

"I believe you could do all that and more," I said. "Talk to Renée, see what she says. I don't want to force you to it."

"Renée." For a moment he frowned, thinking hard; then awkwardly, a little diffident, he said, "It might be the answer for us both. We haven't been very happy—you've known that. If I once got her away from here, everything might be different. She'd stop being bored and dissatisfied, and I'd be a better companion. I wouldn't seem the country boor I do now."

He stood staring in front of him, the new image of himself taking shape and substance, and oddly, with a sort of poignancy, I saw the image too—the Paul he wanted to become, wearing flashier clothes, playing deck quoits on a transatlantic liner. And through his eyes I saw Renée smiling upon him, elegant and sleek, the pair of them enveloped in a little cloud of their own success which would make them kinder to each other.

"Can I discuss this with Renée now?" he asked abruptly. "Before there's any chance of your changing your mind?"

"I shan't change my mind," I said. "Good luck to you, Paul." And foolishly, like an old-fashioned figure in a drawing-room comedy, I put out my hand to him, and he shook it, stiffly, as though sealing a pact. I wondered if this was forgiveness of my own immediate blunders or whether it also included the past that was not mine.

He turned and disappeared into the château, and I went on standing there, watching the black-and-white cattle outlined against the dark trees, feeling the first chill of evening come to me from the long grass. Because no one came to join me, and I was undisturbed, I tried to make my own prayer for Françoise, who was dead through folly and neglect, a prayer which I should not be able to offer later er special Mass or in the mortuary chapel, re acting her husband's part would make a deceiver.

When the church bell tolled solemnly, aking the stillness, I went and joined the ers in the hall. I saw that we were not to k across to the village, but were to go for- ly in the cars. Both were drawn up below terrace, with Gaston in uniform at the el of the first and Paul at the second, and three women, already in deep black, and rie-Noël, in a dark winter coat, entered the in some order of precedence which had ady been decided upon—the comtesse, elf and the child in the Renault, and Paul driving his sister and his wife. Slowly we proceeded through the gateway and over the bridge, and at the same sober pace descended from the cars after two minutes' drive, entered the church, and took our places at the front as we had done on Sunday.

I wondered, kneeling there, listening to the Mass, what petitions went up in fervor or humility from those beside me, whether they asked for the repose of the absent Françoise or pardon for themselves; and it seemed to me that both types of request must by their very likeness fuse, the ultimate purpose of all such prayers being surely the abolition of anxiety and pain.

The Office over, we drove to Villars to stand for a few moments in the mortuary chapel.

It was nearly half past eight by the time we returned to the château, the curé joining us for dinner. The comtesse, whom I had never before seen in the dining room, took her place opposite me at the end of the table, and her presence there, despite the solemnity of the occasion, gave sudden warmth and distinction to the room. Only when the curé had taken his departure did the comtesse, for the first time, flag; and glancing at her, I saw that she had turned suddenly gray. The beads of perspiration stood out on her forehead. Paul had left the salon with the curé, and Blanche, Renée and the child, turning the pages of some book, had noticed nothing.

Quietly I said, "I'm going to take you upstairs." She stared at me as if she did not understand, and then, when I put out my arm to her, she leaned upon it, trembling. I said, loudly, so that the others heard, "I think it would be much better if we went over the lists together in your room."

She straightened herself, gripping my arm more firmly, and as we moved toward the door she said clearly, "Bon soir, bon soir, everybody. Don't disturb yourselves. Jean and I have matters we prefer to discuss upstairs."

They all rose instantly, and Blanche, coming forward, said, "You should never have come down, maman. It has been too much for you."

Her words had just the necessary sting to waken response, and in a second her mother turned, loosening her hold upon my arm, retorting, "When I want advice from you I'll ask it. There are some four hundred envelopes to address before tomorrow evening. I suggest you make a start tonight, and the child can help."

We went out of the room and climbed the stairs together to the first corridor. As she paused there for a moment to regain breath she said, "Why did I say that? What are the invitations for?"

"The funeral," I said. "The funeral on Friday."

"Whose funeral?"

"Françoise's," I replied. "Françoise died today."

"Of course," she said. "For a moment I had forgotten. I was thinking of that time when we made lists for Blanche's wedding. We had the invitations printed, and then none of them were used."

She took my arm again and we mounted the second flight.

Charlotte opened the door for us, and I could see from her face that she was frightened. She darted a look at me, suspicious, anxious, and when the comtesse had passed through into the room she whispered to me, "The boxes have gone from the dressing room."

"I know," I said. "I took them away."

"What for?" she said. "I shall need them tonight."

"No," I said.

I pushed by her, following the comtesse, and I said, "Undress and get into bed, maman. You may sleep, you may not. Either way, it doesn't matter. I shall stay here in the room with you tonight."

Her shadow, reflected on the ceiling, monstrous and overpowering like a witch, seemed part of the heavy curtains, and the hangings to the bed; but when she turned and looked at me the movement dwarfed the shadow, the shadow shrank to the ground, and the smile belonged to the woman who downstairs in the dining room had held court, opposing tragedy with her own wit and pride.

"The tables are turned," she said. "It's a long time since one of us lay in bed and the other watched. You had a temperature of a hundred and five once when you were twelve years old. I sat in your room beside you and bathed your face. Is that what you're prepared to do for me tonight?"

She laughed and waved me from the room, calling to Charlotte. I went out into the corridor and down to the salon, and found the others turning out the lights, preparing to go to their rooms. Marie-Noël went toward the stairs hand in hand with Blanche.

"You'll come and say good night, papa?" she asked.

"Yes," I promised, and went back into the dining room for a cigarette. When I returned again to the hall I found that Renée had not followed the others, but was waiting for me on the stairs.

"So you want to get rid of us, Paul and me?" she said. "Have you been planning this ever since you returned from Paris?"

I shook my head. "This evening out on the terrace the idea came to me, that's all. If you dislike the thought, put it out of your head."

She did not say anything for a moment; she seemed to be considering. Then she said slowly, "You've altered, Jean. I don't mean because of today and the terrible shock to all of us; I mean for some little while. You're not the same."

"In what way have I changed?" I asked.

She shrugged her shoulders. "I don't just mean you've changed to me. I realize now that you were amusing yourself these past months. You were bored, there was nothing else for you to do, and I happened to be here. You've changed somehow in yourself, become harder, more withdrawn."

"Harder?" I said. "I should have thought the reverse. Softer, weaker in every way."

"Oh, no." She considered me thoughtfully. "I'm not the only one to notice it. Paul said the same thing only a day or two ago, when you burned your hand. You've been more detached, not only to me but to everyone. That's why it surprised us both that you made this suggestion that we should travel, and not you. From your behavior the past week, you gave the impression that the one thing in the world you wanted was to get away."

I stared at her, disconcerted. "I gave that impression?" I said.

"Frankly, yes."

"It isn't true. I've never stopped thinking about all of you, day and night," I told her. "The château, the foundry, maman, the child, the whole family—you've been continually in my mind. The last thing I want to do is to go away."

She looked incredulous. "I don't understand you," she said. "I suppose the truth is that I never have. I was a fool to imagine I once did. You were never in love with me for one minute, were you?"

"I'm not in love with you now, Renée," I said. "I don't know about the past, but I rather doubt it."

"You see?" she said. "You are harder. You have changed. You can't even be bothered to pretend any more." She paused, and then slowly, reluctantly, she added, "Did you make that contract cold-bloodedly, deliberately, on the chance that—that what happened today might happen anyway?"

"If you think I made that contract believing Françoise would die, no, Renée," I said.

She drew in her breath. "I'm glad. In the mortuary chapel this evening I was suddenly . . . overwhelmed by everything that had happened. A week ago I couldn't have left St. Gilles, but now"—she turned and began to climb the stairs—"now I know I can't go on living here. I must get away—it's the only hope we have for the future, Paul and I."

I watched her disappear along the corridor, and I wondered whether it was in truth Françoise's death that had caused her shame, or whether it was my reserve, my indifference to her as a woman, that had killed her own desire.

As I switched off the light and climbed the stairs in darkness, it seemed to me that what I had done to these two, Paul and Renée, was not my own doing, nor yet that of Jean de Gué, whose shadow I had become, but the work of a third—someone who was neither he nor I, but a fusion of us both, who had no corporeal existence, who was born not of thought but of intuition and brought release to us both.

Marie-Noël had asked me to say good nigh and presently I turned the handle of her doo expecting to find her still dressed, or at he prie-dieu. But the long day had closed upo her at the last. She was in bed, asleep.

I blew out the candles and closed the shu ters. Then I went down the turret stairs an through to the other side of the château, t that other room in the tower. Here there wer no candles burning, only a light beside th bed, and the woman on the pillows was nc asleep. Her eyes, sunk in her gray exhauste face, stared up to mine.

"I sent Charlotte to her room," she said. told her, 'Monsieur le Comte is looking afte me tonight. I don't need you.' That's wha you meant me to say, didn't you?"

"Yes, maman," I answered.

Her grip tightened, and I knew she woul hold it thus, through the night, as her defens against darkness, and I must not move, nc withdraw it, for if I did the bond would b loosened and the meaning lost.

"I've been thinking," she said. "In a fe days' time, when everything's over, I sha leave this room, an go downstairs to n old one. It's mo practical. I can kee my eye on things

"If you dream tonight," I said, "I shall here. It won't matter."

I leaned forward and turned out the lig with my burned hand, and at once the dar ness seemed to press upon me, envelopi me. "The doctor's coming right away!"

IN AN HOUR of urgent need, you may have had the feeling of relief and reassurance that comes when you know your family doctor will soon step through your doorway. Then you are most aware of how much it means to have a family doctor.

Of course, any physician in your community would respond to an emergency call. It is not quite the same, however, as having your own doctor who has known you and your family through the years. When he comes, you rely on him not only as a physician, but also as a friend.

This warm relationship can be very important . . . as important, in a way, as the doctor's knowledge of medicine. This is because the family physician, in treating a patient, considers not only the current medical phases of the case, but also the patient's personal medical background. Furthermore, a doctor who has year-to-year contact with you can help ease many worries which illness often magnifies.

Whether your doctor is called for a serious emergency or a minor illness, he brings to you the latest developments of medical science. These include new methods of diagnosis, new drugs and treatments for restoring health or controlling many diseases. He also brings to you his own broad knowledge of medicine gained through years of study in schools, hospitals and clinics.

There are other equally good reasons for having a family doctor. When you go to him for periodic health check-ups, he can often detect trouble early and take appropriate action promptly. Moreover, by consulting your doctor periodically, you get his advice about how to help keep in good physical condition . . . with proper diet and sensible habits of work, sleep and relaxation.

Your friend, the family doctor, is the first to know when hospital care is needed . . . and when a specialist should be called to advise and assist him in giving you the latest specialized treatment necessary in your case.

Specialists, because of their detailed knowledge and experience in diagnosing and treating diseases falling within their particular field, are important allies of the family doctor.

Your family doctor will welcome an invitation to become a "part of your family circle." One of the most practical steps, therefore, that you can take for future health and happiness is to consult your family doctor now . . . and keep in touch with him over the years.

village, the village itself awoke. In a moment, so it seemed, there was smoke coming from a chimney, a dog barking, the lowing of cattle. I was no longer isolated, watching apart, numb with exhaustion, but one among many, part of St. Gilles. I thought of the curé waking to the day, his untroubled face clouding as he remembered the disaster at the château. And I thought, also, of the people in the village, unknown to me, who had come to the Mass last night from respect for Françoise, standing with bent heads and eyes averted. Ernest, the driver of the lorry, had been there, and Julie, and her small grandson, Pierre. I knew suddenly, with conviction, that it was not a stranger's curiosity that drew me to them, a sentimental attraction to the picturesque, but something deeper, a desire so intense for their well-being and their future that although akin to love it resembled pain. This longing, strongly felt, was yet somehow impersonal: it did not spring from a wish to stand well with them, and it included, in some curious fashion, not only the village people and those who now seemed part of me, sleeping within the château, but inanimate things beyond—the contour of a hill, a sloping sandy road, the vine clinging to the master's house, the forest trees.

As I sat there by the base of the statue, the sun rose and the morning mist dissolved. The château itself stood out clear-cut, yet sleeping still, until the shutters in a room of the western tower opened suddenly and I saw a figure stand for a moment by the long window. It was Blanche; and her sudden action, flinging wide the shutters of her room, made me wonder whether she, too, had held vigil all the night.

I got up and walked across the park toward the château, and it was not until I had crossed the moat and stood beneath her window that she noticed me. I called up to her, "My hand is troubling me. Would you dress it for me?"

She did not answer, but withdrew into her room, leaving the windows open, from which I concluded that, as always, her silence meant indifference to my presence, but she did not refuse to help me. Going to her room, I knocked but, hearing no answer, turned the handle and entered. She was standing by a table unrolling a fresh dressing. Her face was set, expressionless. She was wearing a dark brown dressing gown, and her hair, swept back from her face and pinned in a bun behind, was as she wore it during the day.

Blanche did not look at me, but putting out her hand took mine in hers and removed the dressing Béla had placed upon it on Sunday night.

"If you made a vow of silence," I said to her, "you broke it yesterday, in the hospital. It isn't valid any more." She did not answer. She went on dressing my hand. "Fifteen years ago," I said, "the death of one person came between us. It took the death of another, yesterday, to loosen your tongue. Wouldn't it be simpler for both of us, and for the family, too, if we made an end to silence?"

My hand seemed suddenly defenseless now it was bare. I could move it, clench the fist, and it no longer hurt. She took the new dressing and covered the burn. It felt fresh and cool and clean.

"It would be simpler for you," she said, without raising her eyes, "just as it was simpler for you to let Françoise die. It has made life easier for you. She's no longer in your way."

"I did not let her die," I said.

"You lied about your blood," she said. "You lied about that contract. You've lied about everything through the years. I don't want to speak to you, now or in the future. We have nothing to say to each other."

She had finished the dressing. She let go my hand. The gesture was final, a dismissal.

"You're wrong," I said. "I have much to say to you. If you accept me as head of the family, you are bound to listen to me, even if you don't agree."

She glanced up at me briefly, and then moved away, replacing the stock of dressings in a chest of drawers. "Coming into a fortune may give you a sense of power," she said, "but it doesn't entitle you to respect. I don't think of you as head of the family, nor does anyone. You've never done anything to justify the name."

I looked about me, at the severity, the coldness, the tortured pictures of the scourged Christ, the crucified Christ, that must face her upon the blank impersonal walls as she lay there in her high narrow bed, and I said to her, "Is that why you hang those pictures there? To remind yourself that you can't forgive?"

She turned and looked at me. "Don't mock my God," she said. "You've destroyed everything else in my life. Leave Him to me."

"Would you have hung them in the master's house?" I asked. "Would they have gone as part of your dowry to Maurice Duval?"

Now at last I had broken down reserve. "How dare you speak of him?" she said. "How dare you even utter his name? Do you think I ever forget one moment, day or night, what you did to him?"

"No," I said, "you haven't forgotten. Nor have I. You can't forgive me—perhaps I can't forgive myself. In that case, why were we both so moved yesterday morning when we discovered that Marie-Noël had gone to the well?"

What I had hoped for, and what I had also feared, then happened. Tears rose in her eyes, ran down her cheeks. She went over to the window and stood beside it looking out, her back defenseless, betraying the emotion that I could not see.

Presently she turned, dry-eyed now, composed. "That exhibition must have pleased you," she said. "It amused you, even as a boy, to see me cry."

"Then perhaps," I said. "Not any more."

"In that case, what are you waiting for?" she asked.

I could not ask forgiveness for something I had not done. As scapegoat, I could only bear the fault.

"I was looking in the album last week," I said. "I found the old snapshots of ourselves as children. And later ones as well. Groups at the verrerie, with Maurice there among them."

"Well?" she asked. "What of it?"

"Nothing," I answered. "Only that I wished what came about fifteen years ago had never happened."

She stared at me, incredulous, and I supposed that what I was telling her was so alien to anything her brother might have said that she could not accept it.

"You think I'm lying," I said. "I'm not. I mean every word."

"If you want to make your confession," she said, "don't make it to me. It's fifteen years too late." She moved about the room, straightening things already orderly, using preoccupation to disguise emotion. "What use is it to either of us now," she asked, "to come here and accuse yourself? You can't bring Maurice back. You hadn't even the courage to shoot him yourself, but went that night to the verrerie pretending to be alone, asking him to hide you; and he came down and opened the door to let you in, and there you stood with your little band of murderers. God may forgive you, Jean. I can't."

She went and stood by the window once again, the air coming fresh and cool into the room. But when I followed and stood beside her, she did not move away.

"From the first you were against Maurice, you and maman," she said. "Even in the early days, when he first came to work at the verrerie. You were envious because papa thought so much of him. Then later, when papa gave him control and made him master, you began to hate him. Because Maurice came from the people you pretended to despise him. Papa was never like that; he understood. He wouldn't have tried to prevent us marrying, as you did. When the armistice came, and the occupation, you had your chance. So easy, wasn't it, to make murder seem heroic? It happened in other families. Ours wasn't the only one."

She gestured with her hands. It was suddenly over. The past was the past. She turned and looked about her at the alcove set in the tower, bare and simple like a convent cell.

"Now I have this," she said, "instead of the master's house. If I was emotional yesterday morning, you know why."

I think that what endeared her to me most, being alien and a stranger, was that she tutoyé'd me still. The custom of a lifetime could not be broken by the silence of fifteen years. There was hope for the future in this if nothing else.

"I want you to go to the master's house and make it yours," I said. "I want you to make it come alive again, as it was when Maurice had it, to be the master now in place of him." Dumfounded, she did not answer, only stared at me in disbelief, and swiftly I went on talking. "I've told Paul he can go. He's only been directing the verrerie since the war through a sense of duty—you know that. They ought to get away, to travel, he and Renée. It's the one likelihood they have of pulling their marriage together. Paul has never had a chance of showing what he can do in business, in meeting people, outside St. Gilles. It's time he did."

Perhaps it was the note of urgency in my voice, belying cynicism, that most astounded her. She sat down, not realizing, I believe, that she did so, and stared at me, clasping the arms of her chair.

"Someone of the family has to take over," I said. "I can't. I don't know the first thing about it, and have no desire to learn. If you had married Maurice, you would have shared the verrerie between you. When Marie-Noël grows up it will be hers. If she marries, it can be her dowry. Either way, the only person who understands and loves it is yourself. I want it to be your trust, your responsibility, because of Maurice, because of Marie-Noël."

Still she said nothing. I think if I had struck her across the face she could not have been more stunned. "The house is waiting there for you," I said. "It's been waiting for fifteen years. Pictures, china, tables, chairs, even his books, all the things you would have used together. You belong to the verrerie, to that house; you could design and engrave again, as you did once, and create something delicate and fragile like the château the child found in the well. And then, instead of sending scent bottles and medicine phials to a firm like Carvalet, who would do better to buy them mass-produced, you could choose your own market, the market Paul will find for you, demanding fine workmanship, artistry, skill."

I paused, exhausted, drained suddenly of energy. And just as holding the mother's hand through the night had seemed to invest me with her own past phantoms of regret, so the eyes of Blanche upon me now, losing their bitterness, becoming reflective, considerate, even kind, gave light somehow to herself, healing her own sorrow, while the loneliness that had been hers was now my loneliness, engulfing me in a darkness that must be carried and endured.

I said to her, "I'm tired. I haven't slept."

"Nor I," she said. "I found I couldn't pray."

"We're quits then," I answered. "We've both been to the depths. But the child went first and wasn't afraid. When you go to the verrerie, Blanche, there's something you might do. Get your workmen to clear the rubble and find the spring once more. There ought to be water in the well."

I left her sitting there, and went out of her room and down the corridor to the dressing room. I flung myself on the camp bed, closed my eyes and slept dreamlessly until past ten, when I awoke to find Gaston shaking me by the shoulder, telling me that I had to be at Villars at eleven o'clock.

God does not want us to do extraordinary things: He wants us to do ordinary things extraordinarily well.

BISHOP GORE

I got up, shaved and bathed and dressed again, and went with him into the town. The formalities were soon over. Only the commissaire was there. He read me his report and emphasized that the inquiry was now officially closed. When I came out one of the officials told me that someone was waiting to speak to me in an adjoining room. It was Vincent, who helped Béla at L'Antiquaire du Pont, and he had a small package in his hands.

"Forgive me, Monsieur le Comte," he said. "Madame could not get in touch with you in any other way. This package came from Paris yesterday. She knows now it arrived too late. But she wanted me to give it to you, for the little girl."

I took the package from him. "What is it?" I asked.

"Some porcelain was broken," he said. "The little girl, your daughter, asked madame if it could be mended. It was impossible, as I believe madame told you. Instead, she sent to Paris for duplicates. She asked me to beg you not to tell the little girl that they are substitutes. She believes the child would be happier not to know, but to keep them in memory of her mother."

I thanked him, and then, hesitating, asked, "Did madame send any other message?"

"No, Monsieur le Comte. Just that, and her deep sympathy."

When we got back to St. Gilles I saw Marie-Noël waiting for me on the terrace. She ran forward and flung herself upon me. Then she turned and said, "Gran'mie was down early, before eleven. She's in the salon preparing it for maman. Maman is going to lie there all tomorrow, so that visitors can come and pay their last respects." She looked excited, impressed. I noticed she was wearing the locket pinned on to her dark frock. "Madame Yves is helping gran'mie," she went on. "She said she was the only person who remembered how things were arranged when my grandfather died. They are arguing now about the position of the table."

She took my hand and led me to the salon. I could hear the sound of voices raised in dispute. I entered the room with the child. A long table, covered with a lace cloth, stood between the windows and the door. The comtesse was sitting on a chair beside the table, and Julie, with another white drapery over her arm, confronted her.

ANNIVERSARY HEART CHRISTMAS BRIDE HALLOWEEN

"But I assure you, Madame la Comtesse, the table was more in the center and we did not use the lace cloth but the damask, this one that I have here which I found at the back of the linen cupboard."

"Nonsense," answered the comtesse. "We used the lace. The lace belonged to my mother. It was in my mother's family for a hundred years."

"Very possibly, Madame la Comtesse," said Julie. "I don't dispute it. I remember the lace cloth perfectly; you produced it when the children were christened and it made a fine background for the cake. But for mourning, that's another matter. The white damask is more suitable to pay tribute to Madame Jean, just as it did in 1938 for Monsieur le Comte."

"The lace hangs better," said the comtesse. "No one would know it wasn't an altar cloth. It would deceive Monsieur le Curé himself."

"Monsieur le Curé perhaps," said Julie. "He is shortsighted. It won't deceive the bishop."

"I don't care," said the comtesse. "I prefer the lace."

"In that case," said Julie, "there's no more to be said. The lace it will have to be. And I suppose the damask must go back to the linen cupboard to be forgotten for another twenty years. Who looks after things nowadays at the château? I ask myself. It wasn't like this in the old days."

She sighed, folding the damask cloth on the end of the table.

"What else do you expect," said the comtesse, "with servants as they are today? They none of them have any pride in their work."

"Then it's the fault of the mistress," said Julie. "A good mistress makes a good servant. I remember when you used to come down into the kitchen we none of us spoke afterward for half an hour, we were so frightened. Often we couldn't eat. That is how it should be. But today ——" She shook her head, her sentence unfinished.

"I've been ill," said the comtesse. "Things have got out of hand. It will be different in future."

"I hope so," said Julie. "It was time."

"You say that because you're jealous," said the comtesse. "You always liked coming up here poking your nose into what didn't concern you."

"It does concern me," said Julie. "Anything that happens here to you, Madame la Comtesse, or to any of the family, concerns me. I was born in St. Gilles. The château, the verrerie, the village, that's my life."

"You're a tyrant," said the comtesse. "I hear your daughter-in-law ran off with a mechanic because you made life impossible for her."

"I a tyrant?" said Julie. "I'm the most tolerant woman in the world, Madame la Comtesse. It was my daughter-in-law who nagged from morning till night. It's a good thing for my Andre she has gone. Now we shall have peace at last."

"You haven't enough to do," said the comtesse, "that's your trouble. Poking about in the verrerie grounds with a few chickens. In future you can come up to the château twice a week and help me set things in order once again. I was right, though, about the lace cloth."

"You are free to form your own opinion, Madame la Comtesse," said Julie. "I won't argue with you. But if it's the last word I ever utter, I shall insist that it was the damask cloth we used at the funeral of Monsieur le Comte."

They stared across the table at each other in perfect understanding. Then the comtesse, aware of my presence for the first time, wished me bon jour. "Everything went well?" she asked.

"Yes, maman."

"Then we can proceed with the arrangements as planned. You had better help Renee with the addressing of the envelopes. Blanche has disappeared. I suppose, as usual, she's in church. Now go along, both of you. Julie and I have work to do."

We met Gaston in the hall. He was carrying the packet I had left in the car. "Your parcel, Monsieur le Comte," he said.

I took it and went upstairs to the bedroom, the child following me.

"What is it?" she said. "Have you bought something?"

I did not answer. I undid the string and opened the paper. The Copenhagen cat and dog, perfect replicas of the ones that had been broken, lay revealed. I put them on the table where they belonged and then glanced at Marie-Noël. She stood with her hands clasped, smiling.

"You would never know," she said. "You could never tell that anything had happened. They are perfect. Just as if they hadn't been broken. Now I feel myself forgiven. I wish we could stand them in the salon tomorrow, beside the candles, as a symbol."

"I don't think we can," I said. "It might look odd. I think if we leave them here, with all her things, it will mean the same."

We went down to the library, and the lists were waiting for us on the desk. But nobody was there addressing the envelopes, neither Paul nor Renee nor Blanche.

"Where are they?" I said to the child. "Where's everyone gone?"

"I'm not supposed to say," she said, "because gran'mie doesn't know. Aunt Renée is in her bedroom, looking through all her winter clothes. She told me, as a great secret, that after the funeral she and Uncle Paul are going away. They're going to travel, and later on, she said, they might even have a small apartment in Paris."

I took the next envelope, and drew the list between us, so that we could share it. "Is Uncle Paul also looking through his clothes?"

"Oh no," she answered, "he's gone down to the verrerie. Aunt Blanche isn't in church: she went with him, and that's a secret too. They were afraid that if gran'mie knew she would interfere. Aunt Blanche wants to look through the furniture that's stored at the master's house. She said it was a waste nobody lived there, and it ought to be made habitable once again."

"Aunt Blanche said that?" I asked.

"Yes, she told me so this morning. She's going to do something about it. That's why she went down there with Uncle Paul." For a few moments we addressed the envelopes in silence. Then Marie-Noël raised her head and, biting the end of her pen, said, "Rather a dreadful thought came to me just now. I don't know whether to tell it to you or not."

"Go ahead," I said.

"It's just that suddenly," she said, "since maman died, everyone is getting what they want. Gran'mie, who loves everyone to notice her, has come downstairs; Uncle Paul and Aunt Renee are going to travel, which has made them pleased; Aunt Blanche has gone to look at the master's house, where, long ago, before I was born, she meant to live, so she told me once in private. Even Madame Yves is bustling with the linen, which makes her feel important. You have got the money you wanted. As for me"—she hesitated, her eyes troubled, a little sad—"as for me, I haven't been saddled with a baby brother after all, but have you to myself for the rest of my days."

I looked at her, a phrase forgotten or repressed forcing itself to my consciousness. Something about hunger, something about greed. Through the half-open double doors leading to the dining room I could hear the telephone. The sudden ring was an irritation, interrupting thought, for what she was saying to me seemed suddenly important, needing the right answer.

"The thing is," she said, "would any of these things have happened if maman hadn't died?"

Her question, devastating, terrible, seemed to shake the foundation of all belief. "Yes," I said swiftly, "they had to happen, they were bound to happen. It's nothing to do with maman dying. If she had lived they would have come about just the same."

Still she looked doubtful, not entirely satisfied. "When the bon Dieu arranges things, verything is for the best," she said, "but somemes the devil tempts us in disguise. You re-ember what it says in St. Matthew—'All hese things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall own and worship me'?"

The telephone ceased ringing. Gaston was nswering it in the lobby. In a moment or two is footsteps sounded, coming toward us.

"The point is to discover which is which," aid Marie-Noël, "who gives us the things we ant, God or the devil. It must be one or the ther, but how do you tell?"

Gaston came to the double doors and said,
Monsieur le Comte is wanted on the telehone."

I got up and went through to the lobby in he hall. I lifted the old-fashioned receiver and stened.

"Who's there?" I asked.

Someone said, "Ne quittez pas," the line lurred and was indistinct. Then, after a min-te, another voice, a man's said, "Am I speakng to the Comte de Gué?"

"Yes," I answered. "Who is it? What do ou want?"

Softly, almost in a whisper, the voice relied, "It's me. Jean de Gué. I've just seen toay's newspaper. I'm coming back."

I waited, not answering. And then in a mo-ent he spoke again. "You are there?" he aid. "The remplaçant?"

I suppose, because I heard a footstep in the all—Gaston's peraps—caution seized me

angements and plans,

"I'm speaking from

The cool assurance, he certainty with which e spoke, believing I would fall in with his lans, made me hate im the more.

"Where?" I asked.

There was silence for moment. Then, softly, e said, "You know the master's house at he verrerie?"

"Yes," I said.

"I'll leave the car on a side track in the woods," he said, "and come across the or-hard. Wait for me inside the house. I'll be here as soon after seven as I can."

He did not say good-by. The telephone licked as he hung up, and that was all.

I turned from the lobby and went into the all. Gaston and Germaine were passing into nd out of the kitchen quarters to the dining oom with trays for lunch. Outside on the riveway I could hear a car, the Citroën. It would be Blanche and Paul returning from
he verrerie.

I went into the salon, and the comtesse was till sitting there. Julie had gone, bearing the amask cloth with her.

"Who was that on the telephone?" she sked.

"No one of any importance," I replied.
Someone who had seen the morning news-aper." I went over to her and took her hand.
I want to know how you feel," I said. "I ouldn't ask you in front of Julie."

She looked up at me and smiled. "We had a igil, didn't we?" she said. "You slept in your hair. As for me, I never closed my eyes. If you hink this business is going to be easy, you're nistaken."

"I never said it would be easy," I answered.
"It's going to be the hardest thing you've ever done."

"I have to deny myself peace and pleasant dreams for your sake," she said. "That's what it amounts to, doesn't it? Just because you want me about the place. How do I know you won't change your mind again and banish me upstairs?"

"No," I said. "No . . . no!"

My sudden violence amused her. She reached up and patted my cheek. "You're spoiled," she said, "that's your trouble. Julie and I agreed upon it this morning. We all of us martyr ourselves because of you." She paused, and then, looking about her with satisfaction, said, "You know, I was agreeably impressed by Françoise in the mortuary chapel. She had breeding, for the first time. I shall be proud for everyone to come and pay their respects to her tomorrow. It's a great solace not to be ashamed of one's daughter-in-law when she is dead."

Gaston came into the salon and announced lunch and we left the salon.

The others were already in the dining room. Glancing at Paul and Blanche, I saw they had the faces of conspirators—sharing a secret that had turned out well for both. When Blanche, saying grace as she always did, looked at me afterward, not smiling but somehow confident, assured, I knew that something at least had been achieved that morning.

As the mother took her seat opposite me I said, "Now you are back again, where you belong, I intend making other changes too. I've already discussed them with Blanche and Paul and Renée. Paul isn't going to direct the ver-rerie any more. He's going to travel, taking Renée with him."

My statement left her unmoved. Forking a piece of kidney from her plate to the terriers, who crouched on either side of her, she said,
"An excellent idea. They ought to have gone before. Who will take his place? Not Jacques, surely? He hasn't the authority."

"Blanche," I replied. "She knows more about the verrerie than any of us. In future she will live at the master's house."

Even this failed to excite her. I don't know what I had expected. Abuse of Blanche perhaps, mockery, certainly a torrent of words.
Instead she said almost placidly, "I always said Blanche had a head for business. I don't know where she gets it from—certainly not from me.
Nor was your father brilliant. He looked upon the verrerie as a family tradition, not as a commercial proposition. But Blanche"—she raised her head and glanced across the table at her daughter—"she'll have the tourists here in no time at all. A shop inside the gates, selling replicas of the château and the church, ice creams from Julie at the lodge. It would have happened long ago, only that the war intervened."

She went on eating. Paul, throwing a look at me, said quickly, "You don't disapprove, then? Either of this plan or the other?"

"Disapprove?" she echoed. "Why should I disapprove? Both suggestions suit me well.
What in the world would Blanche do with herself should I decide to come downstairs every day? Or Renée, either, for that matter."
She glanced at her daughter-in-law. "It's only when women have nothing to do that they get into mischief."

THE YOUNG

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

Incomplete music hurts the ear too young
To hear the chord resolved.
Nor love, nor art
Can show a child how prayer is lived and sung.
The unclosed circle breaks the untaught heart.

Blindly, beggingly, ceaselessly demanding
A prince for every princess, keys for locks,
We move through dreams of partial understanding While time wears down the faces of the clocks.

And do not say, The young are fortunate;
But count the hours of clenched hands and defeat Till (through what stress?) we reach the ultimate—Music resolved and circles closed, complete.

So there was to be no argument. The child was right. Everyone had what they wanted.

As I saw these things I was aware of Marie-Noël, watching me from across the table. "Well?" I said. "What now?"

"Just this," she said. "You've made plans for everyone but yourself. What are you going to do when everybody's gone?"

Her question caught attention from the rest. They all looked at me, curious.

"I shall stay here," I said, "at the château, at St. Gilles. I've no intention of going away. I shall stay here always."

As I spoke I knew what I was going to do. I had remembered the service revolver in the drawer of the library desk. On Saturday I had burned my hand to spare myself humiliation and discovery because I could not use a gun. Today was different. The greatest fool on earth could hardly miss at point-blank range. I should have no remorse and no regret. He would receive the welcome he deserved.

Gaston came with vegetables. Everyone began to talk at once, except myself. The mother, holding me with her eyes, framed with her lips the question, "What's the matter?" I shook my head, gesturing, "Nothing." I could see him climbing into the car at Deauville, driving off, confident, assured of the little world that waited for him, and I wondered whether it was his intention to dismiss me with a handshake and a smile, and then resume the life it had amused him to throw away. If so, his scheme would come to nothing. I was the substance now and he the shadow.

After lunch my opportunity came. Blanche and the child went upstairs for lessons. The mother called the others to see the rearrangement of the salon. I went to the library, crossed over to the desk and pulled open the drawer. I saw the butt of the revolver beside the photograph album. I took it out and opened it, and it was loaded. I slipped the revolver into my coat pocket, went upstairs to the dressing room and put it away in the drawer beside the boxes containing the morphine and the syringe.

When I came downstairs I realized I had been only just in time. They were moving into the library. Paul sat down at the desk, Renée at the table, and both of them began addressing envelopes. The mother, settling herself in a chair where she could watch them, put out her hand to me.

"You're restless," she said. "What's on your mind?"

As I looked at her I reminded myself that it was not her son I was going to kill but someone apart, without emotions, who had no feeling for her or anyone else. She recognized me as her son. In future I should do everything for her that he had failed to do.

"I want to bury the past," I said. "That's the only thing on my mind."

"You've been doing your best to resurrect it," she answered, "with your plan for Blanche."

"No," I said, "that's what you don't understand."

She shrugged her shoulders. "Just as you like," she said. "The whole thing is a conspiracy, of course, to make life more pleasant for yourself. Come and sit down."

She gestured to the chair beside her and I sat down, still holding her hand. Presently, I saw she slept. Paul, turning his head, said quietly, "She's doing much too much."

"No," I said, "it's better this way."

Renée glanced at me from the table. "She ought to be resting upstairs," she said. "Paul is right. She'll have a complete breakdown after the funeral."

"That's my risk," I said, "and my responsibility."

The long afternoon wore on. There was no sound but the scratching of the pens. I looked at the mother's face, asleep, and knew suddenly I must go before she woke. Paul had his back to me, and Renée also. They must none of them know where I was going. Some impulse, like touching wood to ward off danger, made me kiss the mother's hand. Then I rose and went out of the room. No one looked up or called me back.

I fetched the revolver from the dressing room, and went out of the front door onto the terrace and round the side of the château to the garden door. I went through to the park, under the chestnuts, and so out of the domaine. Never had the forest seemed more beautiful or more benign, the hot sun gilding the falling leaves.

When I came to the field bordering the verrerie grounds I lay down and waited. It was no use entering the master's house until Jacques had gone and the men had stopped work for the day. I remembered I had seen cans of petrol standing in the shed where they kept the lorry. Petrol was necessary for my purpose.

Two hours must have passed. I had no means of telling, without a watch, but of a sudden the air became more chill, the sun had dipped behind the trees, and I was aware of silence. The machinery had ceased. I got up and crossed the orchard, keeping close to the hedge, and stood against the wall of the master's house.

I waited a moment, then, sheltered by the vine, looked in at the office window. The room was empty. Jacques had gone home, and I had the place to myself. I moved along the house to the farther end and climbed through the window once again. The room was full of traces of Blanche and Paul. Some of the furniture had already been shifted,

MARTHA JANE

By MARY WRIGHT LAMB

The night lives in your skin, and perhaps it dwells within.
(Well, the joys of night outweigh those of day, little chin.)

Yours, the beauty of the high-vaulted, thunderclouded sky;
silly April's shades of blue not for you, little eye!

Your refraction being weak, in your face the shadows speak.
(Well, a shade is well come by in July, little cheek.)

tables and chairs pulled forward, pictures moved. She had not wasted time. She knew what she wanted to do. The room was no longer a shell, housing the past, but waited, expectant, for her to bring life to it once more.

I sat waiting, too, for the man I meant to kill. Sunlight went from the room, the shadows grew. In half an hour or less it would be dusk, and when he came, knocking on the window or the door, he would find that what happened to him was his own crime in reverse. He, and not I, would go back fifteen years.

I saw the handle of the door turn first, and because of disuse the knob fell to the floor. The door did not open, for I had bolted it. I crossed the room, picked up the knob and fitted it back. Slowly I withdrew the bolt, holding the revolver ready. I opened the door, and it was thus, I thought, that Maurice Duval must have opened his door that night, and found him standing there in the darkness. As I opened the door a voice—not his—said, "Hullo, is there somebody in the house?" It was not Jean de Gué, it was the curé. We confronted each other, I shaken and nonplused, he smiling, nodding, until his eye, falling upon the revolver, oddly changed.

"Will you allow me?" he said, and he put out his hand and took the revolver from me before I knew what he was about. Then he emptied it, putting the cartridges in the pocket beneath his cassock, and the revolver also.

"I don't like those things," he said. "We had enough of them during the war, and during the occupation too. They caused a lot of damage, and they could do so again."

He looked up at me, and because I was without words, unable to speak, he patted my arm and said, "Don't be angry. You'll be glad that I took it away from you one of these days. You had planned destruction, hadn't you?"

I didn't answer him at once. Then I said, "Yes, father."

"Very well," he said, "we won't discuss it. It's a matter for your own conscience and for God. It's not my business to ask you what is wrong. But it is my business to save life if I can." He looked about him at the darkening room. "I've been visiting André Yves," he said. "Happily, in time, he may recover the use of his arm. He has great endurance. He said to me a week or so ago, 'It might be better if I put an end to myself.' 'Not so, André,' I told him. 'The future begins today. It's a gift, to which we wake each morning. Make use of it, don't throw it away.'" He paused, and then, pointing to the furniture, said, "So it's true then, what Mademoiselle Blanche told me this afternoon at the château? She may come here to live, and it was your suggestion?"

"If she told you so, it's true," I answered.

"Then you certainly would not want to do anything to make her change her mind," he said. "There's an old saying: two wrongs don't make a right. Perhaps, if I had not happened to pass by, something would have happened to cause grief to all of us. There has been tragedy enough in your family without your adding to it."

"I wasn't going to add to tragedy, father," I said. "I hoped to remove the cause."

"By destroying yourself?" he asked. "What good would that do, to you or to them?"

He waited for me to answer. I said nothing.

"Well, now"—he hesitated, turning again to the door—"I can't offer you a ride—I came on my tricycle. I don't see the car outside. How will you go home?"

"I walked," I said, "and I shall return that way."

"Why not walk beside me?" he suggested. "I go very slowly, you know." He drew out his watch. "It's after seven already," he said. "They may be looking for you at the château. I'm dull company on the road, but I'd like you to join me."

"Not tonight, father," I said. "I'd rather be alone."

Still he hesitated, his eyes anxious. "I'm not sure that I'm happy to leave you. You might still do something rash that you'd regret."

"I can't," I said. "You've made it impossible."

He smiled. "I'm glad," he said. "I shall never regret it. As for your gun"—he patted his cassock—"perhaps I'll let you have it back again, one of these days. It will depend upon yourself. Bon soir."

He went out the doorway into the dusk. I watched him pass the well without a glance, and so across the ground toward the sheds. I closed the door and bolted it again. As I went to the window facing the orchard, a figure rose from beneath it, gun in hand, and throwing his legs across the sill climbed in. Laughing softly, pointing the gun at my chest, he said:

"That's how I worked it once before, but this was far easier. No sentries on the road, no huts, no blocks, no wire. And instead of a bunch of lads who might give me away under threat, good Monsieur le Curé himself, who happened to pass by. You must admit that luck is always on my side. I was right, wasn't I, to come armed? It was the only thing I didn't leave you in my valise in Le Mans."

He pulled forward two of the chairs that Blanche had moved that morning.

"Sit down," he said. "You don't have to keep your hands up. This isn't a threat, merely a precaution. I've always carried a gun since '41." He sat down in the other chair and straddled it, facing me. The back of it made a resting place for the gun. "So you planned to get rid of me, did you, and stay in St. Gilles? The sudden prospect of a fortune was too much for you? I sympathize. I felt that way myself."

I couldn't see his eyes, but only his features, dimly, which were mine. The absence of light made his presence, although more sinister, somehow easier to bear.

"What happened?" he asked. "How did she die? The notice I read this morning said by accident."

"She fell," I answered, "from the window of her bedroom. She had dropped the locket brooch you brought her back from Paris, and was reaching for it. The commissaire of police held an inquiry and was satisfied. Tomorrow they bring her back to St. Gilles, and the funeral is on Friday."

"I read that in the papers," he said. "That's why I returned."

I made no comment. It was not the funeral of his wife which had brought him home, but what her death would mean to him hereafter.

"You know," he said, "I never thought you'd face it. When I left you in that hotel bedroom a week ago today, I imagined you going to the police, telling them your story, and, after many muddled explanations, persuading them to believe it. Instead"—he laughed—"you've succeeded in living a lie for seven whole days. My congratulations. Tell me, has no one had any suspicion?"

"No one," I said.

"What about my mother, and the child?"

"They least of all."

To say this gave me a strange sort of satisfaction that was almost savage. He had not been missed; no one had regretted him.

"I wonder how much you learned," he said. "It amuses me immensely to think of how you dealt with Renée, for instance, who already, before I left, was becoming a bore. And how you kept Françoise pacified. And whether, with misplaced courtesy, you tried to talk to Blanche. As for my mother, her demands can only be dealt with in the future by a doctor. Not our own, needless to say. She'll have to go to a home. I'm already in touch with one, in Paris."

I watched the muzzle of the revolver on the back of his chair. I should never reach it. Expert in trickery as in all things, he would be too quick for me. "There's no need to send her to Paris," I said. "Though she may need medical care at home. She wants to stop the drug. I was with her all last night. She's made the first attempt."

I could feel his eyes upon me in the darkness. "What do you mean?" he asked.

I thought back to the chair beside her bed, to the half-dreams, to the silence, to the threatening shadows that seemed to dissolve and pass. "I sat beside her and she slept," I said. "I held her hand."

His laughter, infectious yet intolerable, rang through the dark room. "My poor friend," he said, "do you imagine that is the way to cure a morphine addict? Tonight she'll be a raving maniac. Charlotte will have to give her a double dose."

"No," I said. "No." But doubt assailed me. Already, when I left her, she had looked tired.

"What else?" he said. "Tell me what else you've done."

What else? I searched my mind. "Paul," I said, "Paul and Renée. They're leaving the château, leaving St. Gilles. They're going to travel, at any rate for six months or a year."

I saw him nod. "That will break up the marriage even sooner," he said. "Renée will find the lover she's been searching for, and Paul feel himself more inferior than ever. Put him in the world and he'll look what he knows he is—a provincial boor. What want of tact, if I may say so, how lacking in finesse. Tell me more."

I remembered, as a boy, playing skittles. One bowled a ball along an alley, and the ninepin at the other end toppled and fell flat. This was what he was doing now to the plans I had conceived through love. It was not love, then, after all, but muddled sentiment.

"You turned down the Carvalet contract, didn't you?" I said. "I signed a new one. The verrerie won't close. No one will be out of a job. You'll have to back the loss with capital."

This time he didn't laugh. He whistled. The expression of dismay delighted me. "I suppose I can get out of it," he said. "It may take time. Your other moves were minor blunders, but this is serious. Even with Françoise's money behind me, propping up a dying business is no fun. Whom did you intend to look after things, with Paul away?"

"Blanche," I said.

He leaned forward in his chair, tilting it, and thrust his face close to mine. "You actually spoke to Blanche?" he asked. "And she replied?"

"I did," I said. "She came down here this morning. I told her the verrerie was hers from now on. She can do what she likes with it, she can build it up as a dowry for Marie-Noël."

He said nothing for a moment. The upsetting of all his preconceived ideas may have shaken him. I hoped it had.

"Do you know," he said slowly, "it might work. If Blanche took up designing again, and we could turn out cheap gimcrack stuff to attract the tourist, not bothering with Carvalet or any of the other good firms, we might attract a market in this part of the country that would undercut everyone else. Instead of every tourist driving through Villars to Le Mans, they would make a detour to St. Gilles. I believe, without knowing it, you've hit upon a plan." He paused for a moment. "Yes," he said, "the more I think of it, the more I like the idea. You haven't done too badly, on the whole. What about Marie-Noël? Has she seen any visions this week, or dreamed any dreams?"

I did not answer. To tarnish the child was surely the ultimate evil. He might desecrate the mother, mock the sister and the brother; but to give him Marie-Noël as a butt for humor, that I would not do.

"She's all right," I said. "She stood yesterday's tragedy well."

"That doesn't surprise me in the least," he said. "The two of them never got on. Françoise was jealous of the child, and the child knew it. No, I am not surprised. . . . Now, at last, you understand what it means to have a possessive family. And you were prepared to endure it, for the sake of the money. You came down here determined to kill me, so that you could keep yourself in comfort for the rest of your days."

"You won't believe me," I said, "but I didn't think about the money. I happen to love your family, that's all."

My statement made him laugh once more. "You have the audacity to tell me," he said, that you love my mother, who is without exception the most egotistical, the most rapacious woman I have, in all my experience, ever known; you love Paul, who is an oaf, a weakling; you love Renée—presumably for her body, which I grant you is enchanting, but he has a mind like an empty box; you love Blanche, who is so twisted with repressed sex and frustrated passion that the only stimulation she gets out of life is to kneel before a bleeding crucifix. And I suppose you'll tell me that you love my child for her sweetness and her innocence, which, let me tell you, can be put on for effect. What she really likes is being petted and admired."

I did not argue. What he said was true, according to his light, and perhaps mine too. The point was, it did not matter.

"I agree with you," I said. "Your family are all those things. It doesn't prevent me from loving them. Don't ask me why. I couldn't answer you."

"I have affection for them," he said. "That's understandable. They happen to belong to me. But you have no reason. You've only known them six days. You're an incurable sentimentalist, of course."

"Perhaps."

"Did you see yourself as a savior?"

"No. As a fool."

"That's honest, anyway. And what do you suppose is going to happen now?"

"I don't know. It's up to you."

He scratched his head with the butt of his revolver. I might have sprung at him then, but it wouldn't have worked.

"Exactly," he said. "What happens at St. Gilles is up to me. I can carry through your program if I choose. Or tear it up, depending on my mood. What about you? Shall we walk into the forest and dig a grave? I can easily burn your car. No one would look for you. You'd simply disappear."

"If that's what you decide," I said, "then go ahead. Unless you prefer to throw me down the well."

I couldn't see him, but I could feel his smile. "Have you raked up that one too?" he said. "What a ferret you are. I thought the mud had settled years ago. I suppose you were shocked?"

"I wasn't shocked," I told him. "Your motive puzzled me."

"My motive?" he echoed. "Of course it puzzled you. You haven't been invaded since 1066. Complacency makes all your countrymen smug. We may be ruthless sometimes, but thank God we're none of us hypocrites. Do you also love your image of Maurice Duval?"

I considered a moment. "I regretted him," I said. "What I heard of him seemed to be good."

"Don't you believe it," he said. "He was a climber, like all his kind. Edged his way in with my father, with an eye to the future. Blanche was his greatest card, and I stopped him playing it. It's not very chic, you know, to sit back in comfort and make terms with your country's invaders to save your skin."

I had no answer. The quarrel was not my quarrel, nor the war my war. I only knew that people had suffered and died.

"It's not much use," I said, "discussing Duval or your family. If you intend to kill me, let's get it over. I'm ready."

"I'm not sure I want to kill you," he said. "It seems rather a waste. After all, we've deceived them once, we could do so again. I could let you know, we could arrange a rendezvous, I could disappear for a week or a month and you take my place. What do you think? Of course I might have undone, in the meantime, all that you've tried to do. But that wouldn't bother you. It might even add zest to your stay."

The object of teaching a child is to enable him to get along without his teacher. ELBERT HUBBARD

I hated him so much I could not answer. And, taking my silence for consideration, he went on, "You'd hardly have met my Béla," he said. "She keeps a shop in Villars, and I call her Béla because she pretends she's descended from the kings of Hungary. Cooks like an angel, and that's not her only attraction. I visit her now and again to keep boredom at bay. Naturally, if we come to an agreement, she'll be part of the bargain. You wouldn't regret a visit, I can promise you."

I got up from my chair. Instantly he rose, too, covering me with the gun. "Let's get it over," I said. "I've nothing more to say."

"I have, though," he answered. "Do you realize you haven't asked me any questions? Don't you want to know what I've been doing the past week?"

"No," I said. "Frankly, I don't care. It doesn't concern me."

"But it does concern you," he insisted. "It concerns you very much. Sit down again and I'll enlighten you." He snapped a lighter, which I realized, in the light of the flame, was mine. And then I saw that his coat was also mine. But not the one I had been wearing in Le Mans. "You see?" he said. "I played the game fair, just as you did. If you were taking my place, then it was only sporting to take yours. I went to London. I went to your flat. I only flew back today."

I stared back at him, or rather not at him but at his shadow. "You went to my flat?" I said. "You used my things?" The duplicity, the outrage, seemed to me overwhelming. I could not believe it.

"Why not?" he said. "That's what you did at St. Gilles. I left you my family. You used them in the way you've described. You can hardly blame me for playing the game in reverse."

I tried to think. I tried to picture the scene. The hall porters would merely nod and say good morning or good night. The woman who cleaned my flat never came until after half past ten, when I had already left. Most people believed me away on the last week of holiday. There was no reason for anyone to telephone, to write. "How did you know where to go? How did you manage?"

"My poor idiot," he replied, "your card was in your valise, your notebook, your checks, your keys, your passport—all the things I was likely to need. To take over your very retiring personality proved the easiest thing in the world. I enjoyed myself. Your flat was a haven of rest. After the turmoil of St. Gilles I felt I was in paradise. I rifled your drawers, read all your letters, deciphered your lecture notes, cashed your checks. I spent five days in complete and utter idleness, which was just what I needed."

The humor, and the justice, struck me at last. I had played about with human life; he had not. I had done my best to change his household; he had merely yawned and taken his ease. I had meddled; he had only spied. Then I remembered that he had, after all, returned.

"If you enjoyed my London solitude so much," I asked, "what made you come back again to France?"

I felt him watch me in the darkness. He did not answer immediately, and when he did it was almost with embarrassment.

"That's where I have to apologize," he said, "but not more so, I think, than you, who by altering that contract may have let me in for very heavy loss. The fact is"—he paused—"the fact is, five days in London were enough. I couldn't have continued your dull, virtuous existence. The easiest thing to do, as I intended using your name and personality, was to change your mode of living. This was, to tell you the truth, just what I did."

It is always the best policy to speak the truth, unless of course you are an exceptionally good liar.

JEROME K. JEROME

I did not understand. I could not follow what he was trying to tell me. "What do you mean?" I said. "How could you change my life?"

I heard him sigh in the darkness. "It may come as a shock," he said, "just as what you have been doing at St. Gilles has come as a shock to me. First I wrote to the university, resigning your job. Then I told your landlord that I was going abroad and wanted to give up the lease of your flat, and, flats being as few and far between in London as they are in Paris, he was only too glad for me—or rather for you—to get out at once. I instructed a firm of auctioneers to sell your furniture. Finally, having found out from your bank statement how much money you had in the bank, I cashed a check for just that amount. It was, if you remember, a couple of hundred pounds. Not a fortune, but enough to tide me over comfortably for a month or two, until something else turned up."

I tried to grasp what he was telling me, to make myself realize that he was speaking of something which had actually happened. "The French currency," I said. "You couldn't do it. How could you have changed two hundred pounds into francs? They wouldn't have given you more than the tourist allowance, and I had already spent three quarters of that."

He put his cigarette stub on the floor and crushed it with his foot. "That," he said, "was the cream of the joke. I have a friend who arranges these things. I did not see him, but he happened to be in London. I should never have known of his arrival, but for the fact that you gave him your address. I couldn't imagine why, but in the circumstances it was a heaven-sent opportunity. When he telephoned, I was never more surprised in my life, and it was then, of course, that I realized you were at St. Gilles. The point is that if I don't kill you, and if you won't agree to my little plan of deception that we share each other's lives from time to time, what are you going to do? There is no future for you."

The full meaning of his words was forced upon me. Unless I liked to make a fool of myself by writing to the university and saying it was all a mistake—that I had decided not to resign after all—I had no work. I had no money, save for one or two modest investments. I had no flat, and if I didn't get back to London soon I should have no furniture. I did not exist.

"Of course," he said, "I didn't intend to come home. I was going to amuse myself spending your money over here. My friend is a wizard with currency, and he would have banked it anywhere I told him. I had in mind, to start off with, some little niche in Sicily or Greece. I would have taken Béla with me as a companion. She might have palled in time, but not at first. Hungarian women have the strangest charm. But now"— he broke off, and I could dimly see the shrug of the shoulders—"poor Françoise dying has rather changed my plans. Instead of being an impoverished provincial count I might, with any luck, be a millionaire. Fate, or whoever arranges these things, has done what I wanted."

He stood up, the gun still pointing at me.
